Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Well, it is practically the same thing. Now, if he had been a captain or a lieutenant or a colonel or a major there would not be, I take it, in accordance with the precedent here established, any questions raised about his pension being increased to $50 a month. We have already passed one bill here to-night raising a pension for a widow, who has no disability, from $30 to $50 a month. We have passed another bill here to-night, a Senate bill, for the pension of a widow whose husband did not die from the effect of wounds or injury contracted in the Army, but simply because he was a brave man and held a certain position; and I would like to see a pension bill pass here once where the merits and rights of a private soldier could be recognized. If there ever was a man who is entitled to a pension of $50 a month this man certainly is, wounded as he has been; and I am opposed to concurring in the amendment and want it left at $50, the amount fixed by the Senate.

Mr. MATSON. If my colleague from Indiana will permit me a moment I think I can explain to him so that he can see the reason why this was done. If this man was entitled to $50 a month there would be no need of our legislation at all; and that is the reason that we reduced the Senate bill to $45, because if the disability was such as to entitle him to a rating of $50 per month he could get it under the present law from the Department. That is the reason we did not adopt the Senate bill.

Now, so far as saying that if he was an officer of higher rank there would not have been any objection to the increase of the pension, let me inform my colleague that the general law makes no distinction in so far as these higher grades of pensions are concerned, but the distinction is only with reference to the lower grades. Congress has not shown any disposition to fix these rates, as the gentleman seems to imagine, by special acts; because where the law fixes the grade, and the disability is sufficient to warrant the pension, there is no need for legislation. I think, therefore, the amendment is right.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Let me ask if we have not the power to increase the pension?

Mr. MATSON. Oh, yes; we have the power to make it a thousand dollars if we want to.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then why should not this man have this pension as well as any other man?

Mr. MATSON. Because the Pension Office could give him $50 if he was entitled to it; and that is the reason we objected to the Senate bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. You admit the proposition that if he was an officer he would be entitled to it?

Mr. MATSON. If necessary to get on with the public business we will admit anything.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET O'CONNOR.

Mr. ROMEIS. I call up House bill 6278, granting a pension to Margaret O'Connor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret O'Connor, late widow of James Hackett, deceased, late of Company G, Eighth Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

James Hackett enlisted September 12, 1861, in Company G, Eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, and was killed February 7, 1864.

His widow, claimant, applied for pension, but the bureau rejected her claim "upon the ground that the soldier being absent from his command, away from the control of his officers and the protection of his comrades, can not be considered as having been within the line of duty at the time of his death. The cause of the soldier's death was not incident to or in any way connected with his military service."

The marriage of James Hackett, the soldier, to the claimant is shown by the affidavit of the officiating magistrate.

The Adjutant-General reports:

"This man, while in Philadelphia, Pa., on the 7th of February, 1864, the regiment being at home for the purpose of receiving veteran furloughs, and before the furloughs were given, was found dead near the navy-yard. Cause of death and circumstances attending same unknown, beyond the fact that the coroner's inquest developed the existence of poison in the stomach, and that the soldier was seen the night before in the company of a stranger upon whose person, when arrested, was found a pair of shoes which it was believed was the property of the deceased. The said stranger escaped from arrest and was not retaken."

John E. Kane, late lieutenant of Company E, Eighth Pennsylvania Cavalry, testifies:

"That Company G, with other companies of that regiment, was, on February 2, 1864, relieved from duty in the Army of the Potomac in accordance with special orders and ordered to report to the governor of Pennsylvania, by reason of reenlistment. That in pursuance of said orders, deponent, with his company, under Captain Howard, now deceased, went to Harrisburg, and were ordered to report to Major Gilbert, Philadelphia, Pa., for furloughs, and arrived at Philadelphia about 12 o'clock m. Were received by the mayor, military, and public. That said James Hackett came to deponent and talked with him, asked deponent to take his money, which deponent declined to do, having taken charge of a large sum for other men in the field to convey to their families. This occurred about 6 o'clock p. m. Deponent returned to the State-house, leaving James Hackett at the Soldier's Rest, and saw him no more that night. James was perfectly sober, and known as a sober man. That deponent saw James the next morning about 8 or 9 o'clock at the Union street station-house a corpse. That he was present at the post-mortem examination; that the evidence before the coroner's jury showed that the body was found near the navy-yard among some timber. The physician testified there was poison in the stomach. That the detachment had not yet reported to Major Gilbert for their furloughs, and was under the command of its officers, and James was with the organization at the date of his death. Deponent made a personal examination of his person and clothes, but not one cent was found. That he was poisoned and robbed was the belief of all who knew the circumstances."

Your committee hereto attach the petition of the claimant:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, Margaret O'Connor, whose post-office address is 266 Washington street, in the city of Williamsport, and State of Pennsylvania, respectfully represents that she was the widow of James Hackett, who enlisted on the 12th day of September, 1861, to serve three years, or during the war, in Company G, Eighth Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, and who served faithfully therein until December 15, 1863, when he re-enlisted in the same company and regiment as a veteran and received a thirty days' furlough, returning to Philadelphia, Pa., with a majority of his company, by order of the Adjutant-General, United States Army, at Washington, D. C., and the adjutant-general, State of Pennsylvania.

While at Philadelphia, on the night of February 6, 1864, the said James Hackett and a squad of his comrades started for some theater; but after going some distance, he left them, saying he would return to the Soldiers' Home, where they were quartered. He turned back, and that was the last seen of him until about 2 o'clock in the morning, when he was found in a vacant lot not far from the Soldiers' Home, apparently having just died, his boots and money taken from him. The coroner's inquest showed he had been chloroformed, which caused his death.

The furloughs were not issued to the said Hackett and his comrades until the 9th of February, 1864, and they were all under the command of their officers, and were until they received their furloughs.

Your petitioner has been denied a pension upon several applications, upon the grounds that the soldier was not in line of duty, the fact of his being in the United States service not being questioned.

Your petitioner prays for the passage of a special act granting her a pension from the 6th day of February, 1864, the date of her former husband's death, until June 5, A. D. 1866, the date of her remarriage; also a pension for her two daughters, Mary Ann Hackett and Bridget Hackett, from February 6, 1864, until the time they were sixteen years of age.

MARGARET O'CONNOR.

This seems to your committee a clear case. Soldier was in the service of the United States at the time he met his death; he was undoubtedly murdered and robbed. That he was not in the line of duty at the time is a mere surmise, and not substantiated by any proof whatever; on the contrary the evidence shows that he declined to accompany his comrades to the theater, and left them to return to his quarters at the Soldiers' Home.

Your committee report favorably, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. DUNHAM (before the Clerk had concluded the reading of the report). I think perhaps a statement could be made in much less time than the report could be read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Well, let some statement be made. I have no objection. Here is the case of a widow who married again and may have married affluently for all the House knows. There is no statement or explanation at all about the claim. The gentleman can make a statement if he prefers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report as above.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I want to ask one or two questions about this case. Who is sponsor for this bill?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I introduced the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This applicant, I believe, has married again.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It seems she has married again.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is in evidence in the case.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I judge from the name she has married again.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I supposed the gentleman knew all about the case.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I do not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Who knows anything about it?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The committee seem to have had a pretty good understanding about it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Who is here to speak for the committee?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Dr. SWOPE made the report, but that gentleman is not here.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Very well. I wish now to inquire what is the law in regard to the widow of a man who died in the service receiving a pension when she marries again.

Mr. MATSON. The law is that she is dropped from the rolls when she remarries; and in case of the death of the second husband she is not restored to the pension-roll. Formerly she was restored in that case.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. As long as she is a widow and is entitled to a pension because of her husband's death she would receive a pension till her remarriage?

Mr. MATSON. I will ask the gentleman from Arkansas to consent that this bill be laid aside informally, as the gentleman who reported it is not here. There may be some circumstances he may desire to know in regard to it which I can not answer as well as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWOPE]. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside informally without losing its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. There seem to be two shortcomings in this case. One is that, according to several decisions on the part of the Pension Bureau, the death of this soldier was not of such a character as entitled the applicant to a pension. The next is that she has married again, and had she been entitled to a pension she would have forfeited her right to it by that act. This may be a small matter, but we are paying sixty or seventy millions of dollars a year for these small matters, and we want to exclude all the small matters that are not meritorious. I have no objection to this bill being laid aside informally.

Mr. ERMENTROUT addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] has made a request for unanimous consent, which must be submitted without debate, that the bill be laid aside informally without losing its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had the Private Calendar under consideration, had instructed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Arkansas, be, and the same is hereby, invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway and telegraph and telephone line through the Indian Territory, beginning at a point on the eastern line of said Territory at or near the city of Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas; thence running, by the most feasible and practicable route, in a northwesterly direction, through the Indian Territory, to such point on the northern boundary-line of said Territory between the Arkansas River, in Cowley County, and the Caney River, in Chautauqua County, Kansas, as said corporation may select; also a branch line of railway to be constructed from the most suitable point on said main line for making a connection with a line of railroad of the Southern Kansas Railway Company terminating at or near Coffeyville, in the said State of Kansas, and at or near the southern boundary-line thereof, and running thence from such suitable point on said main line in a northerly direction, and by the most feasible and practicable route, to the northern boundary line of said Indian Territory at or near Coffeyville aforesaid, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turnouts, and sidings as said company may deem it to their interest to construct along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory for said main line and branch of the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway, and to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to right of way, for stations, for every 10 miles of road, with the right to use such additional ground where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be leased or sold by the company, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken.

SEC. 3. That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the Indian nations or tribes through which it may be constructed, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed one (who shall act as chairman) by the President, one by the chief of the nation to which said occupant belongs, and one by said railroad company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a district judge, clerk of a district court, or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice. And upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the district judge of the court held at Fort Smith, Ark., or at Wichita, Kans., upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings within the nation to which such occupant belongs. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the courts of said nations. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award, and be paid by such railroad company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the district court held at Fort Smith, Ark., or the district court held at Wichita, Kans., which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition according to the laws of the State in which the same shall be heard provided for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes. If upon the hearing of said appeal the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the costs of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railway company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court, the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railroad.

SEC. 4. That said railroad company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territory a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Arkansas for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines, until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territory within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate at all times the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nations or tribes through whose lands said main line and branch may be located, the sum of $50, in addition to compensation provided for in this act for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of the railway, for each mile of railway that it may construct in said Territory, said payments to be made in installments of $500 as each 10 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the general council of either of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowance hereinbefore provided for, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to such dissenting nation or tribe under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by said railway company for said dissenting nation or tribe shall be in lieu of the compensation that said nation or tribe would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision. Said company shall also pay, so long as said Territory is owned and occupied by the Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in the said Territory. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be apportioned by him, in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force among the different nations and tribes, according to the number of miles of railway that may be constructed by said railway company through their lands: Provided, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said nations and tribes, to impose such additional taxes upon said railroad as it may deem just and proper for their benefit; and any Territory or State hereafter formed through which said railway shall have been established may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located lines through said Territory to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be filed in the office of the principal chief of each of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter, or such location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 7. That the officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction and management of said road shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws, and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 8. That the United States circuit and district courts for the western district of Arkansas and the district of Kansas, and such other courts as may be authorized by Congress, shall have, without reference to the amount in controversy, concurrent jurisdiction over all controversies arising between said Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway and the nations and tribes through whose territory said railway shall be constructed. Said courts shall have like jurisdiction, without reference to the amount in controversy, over all controversies arising between the inhabitants of said nations or tribes and said railway company; and the civil jurisdiction of said courts is hereby extended within the limits of said Indian Territory, without distinction as to citizenship of the parties, so far as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That said railway company shall build at least 100 miles of its railway in said Territory within three years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 10. That the said Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking toward the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their land, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian nations any further grant of land, or its occupancy, than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 11. That all mortgages executed by said railway company conveying any portion of its railroad, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said Indian Territory, shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution, and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 12. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act.

SEC. 13. And the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever prior to the construction and completion of the road, except as to mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief statement, subject to the objection which may be interposed subsequently.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Kansas whether this bill has been referred to any committee of the House?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that inquiry I will state that this bill has been unanimously reported by the House Committee on Indian Affairs. A like bill had been previously reported unanimously. This bill has passed the Senate, having been unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs of that body and having passed the Senate with scarcely a dissenting vote, perhaps not one. The bill contains substantially the same provisions as were contained in the bills which were passed in the Forty-eighth Congress providing for the right of way through the Indian Territory. I would state further that this is not a paper company, nor is it a case of asking a charter for speculative purposes. Two important companies are interested in this right of way. One, what is known as the Santa Fé Company, is already operating more than 4,000 miles of railroad, and the Kansas Valley Railroad Company, whose road runs from Fort Smith to New Orleans, is associated with the Santa Fé Company in this enterprise. When the road connecting these two points shall have been completed there will be a continuous line of railway from the Pacific coast to New Orleans. The road across this little gap through the Indian Territory down the Arkansas Valley is the only link now missing in this important chain.

I desire to say, in addition, that at the suggestion of the Indians interested, the language of this bill has been somewhat modified from that used in similar bills in the Forty-eighth Congress. Instead of granting the right of way, as did the bills passed in the Forty-eighth Congress, this bill simply authorizes the construction of this road. That modification of the language has been made at the suggestion of the Indians, in order that the measure might be entirely satisfactory to them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. And they are satisfied with the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no objection to it from any Indian in the Territory so far as we have learned or heard.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. They have been conferred with.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. How wide is the right of way proposed to be granted?

Mr. PERKINS. One hundred feet.

Mr. PEEL. It is just like the other bills—precisely.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] know, or can he affirm to the House, that a road is to be built there in good faith; that the franchise is not sought merely for the purpose of enabling somebody to sell it?

Mr. PERKINS. As I have already stated, the Santa Fé Company has now more than 4,000 miles of road in operation and the Kansas Valley road is in operation from Fort Smith to New Orleans. This will supply the missing link, and make a continuous line.

Mr. ROGERS. And there is a provision in the bill prohibiting the transfer of the franchise. This is not a paper company. The company are anxious to build the road; they will do it in self-defense; they will do it to protect themselves; they need and must have an outlet west and north.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I am glad to understand that. I wanted the fact to be emphasized that this is not a mere speculation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Not at all. The money is now in bank to be used for building the road.

Mr. PETTIBONE. That is exactly what we want.

Mr. TAULBEE. Does the bill involve any incumbrance on the land other than the ordinary right of way?

Mr. PERKINS. None whatever. Condemnation proceedings are to be had, and any parties not satisfied with those proceedings will have the right to appeal to the United States courts.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. DUNHAM. For the present I do. I desire to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman objects, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. DUNHAM. Can I not ask a question without objecting?

Mr. PERKINS. I shall be very glad to answer any question.

Mr. DUNHAM. Has this bill passed the Senate?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir; more than two weeks ago.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will it develop the resources of Arkansas? [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then I am in favor of it.

Mr. DUNHAM. This day has been set apart by previous order of the House for general debate. It seems to me that a debate of an hour or more might be allowed on this bill, so that the House could perfectly understand it. I will not object to the consideration of the bill; but I think debate ought to be allowed on it for at least an hour.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill is before the House for consideration. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS. Moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to call up at this time the bill for the establishment of a subtreasury at Louisville, Ky.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky calls up for consideration a bill which by a vote of the House some time since was postponed until to-day. The Clerk will read the title.

A bill (H. R. 902) establishing a subtreasury at Louisville, Ky.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I see that the prior order for to-day is House bill No. 6973, to provide for the appointment of a commission to inspect and report on the condition of Indians, Indian affairs, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The further consideration of both these bills was by a vote of the House postponed until to-day, and the question of consideration can be raised against either of them.

Mr. WILLIS. My object is to get this bill out of the gentleman's way. At the time the motion was made postponing this bill till to-day I did not know his bill had been fixed for to-day. This bill for the establishment of a subtreasury at Louisville has been debated for an hour and a half in two morning hours. As I have stated, my object in calling it up now is to get it out of the way of business in which other gentlemen are interested. I sincerely hope the House will execute its previous order and allow this bill now to be considered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. I submit that these special orders are not in order until after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Upon what rule or order does the gentleman rely in making that point?

Mr. SPRINGER. The rules of the House require that after the reading of the Journal the Speaker shall call the committees for reports——

The SPEAKER. But by an order of the House made some time ago all Saturdays during the remainder of the session were set apart for general debate only. These orders, made afterward, revoke so much of that prior order as refers to to-day as respects the two bills mentioned. If these orders had not been fixed for to-day there would have been no morning hour and no hour for the consideration of bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the bill which was first made a special order, which was first postponed, is entitled to priority.

The SPEAKER. These two bills—the bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana from the committee on expenditures for Indians and Yellowstone Park and the bill which the gentleman from Kentucky desires to call up—were both postponed until to-day. They are both special orders; and in the opinion of the Chair neither has priority over the other; but the question of consideration can be raised against either of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to raise the question of consideration, if admissible.

Mr. WILLIS. We are very anxious to get this bill out of the way of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. We are equally anxious to get out of the way of the gentleman from Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to raise the question of consideration as against both of these measures.

The SPEAKER. But only one is called up now.

Mr. SPRINGER. The reason being that the bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, which is a continuous order, shall be called up at the earliest possible moment for consideration; and if in order to do so I propose to call it up to-day. It is my intention to maintain that order as against all other measures that conflict with it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen will preserve order upon the floor the Chair will again state the exact condition of the question.

By a vote of the House the further consideration of the two bills, that reported by the gentleman from Indiana from the committee on expenditures for Indians and the Yellowstone Park, and the other called up by the gentleman from Kentucky, for the establishment of a subtreasury at Louisville, were postponed until to-day.

The gentleman from Kentucky now calls up for consideration the bill last mentioned by the Chair, and against that the gentleman from Illinois raises the question of consideration.

Mr. WILLIS. And his is a continuing order, whereas we are confined to a special day. He has the whole of next week.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that unless these bills be considered to-day, this day is dedicated, under an order of the House, to general debate only.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House refuse to consider the bill mentioned by the gentleman from Kentucky, as well as that mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana, will it be then in order to move to proceed to the further consideration of the Oklahoma bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already twice stated that this day has been set apart, until the further order of the House, for general debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, and a special order continuing from day to day does not come up on a day otherwise set apart or dedicated to other business; as, for instance, it would not come up on Friday, which is dedicated to the consideration exclusively of private business.

The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 19.

So the motion of Mr. WILLIS was agreed to.

SUBTREASURY, LOUISVILLE, KY.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was up for consideration some days ago I said about all I cared to say in opposition to it. My own opinion is, as then expressed, that it should not be passed, and to press it I still insist is wholly inexcusable. I can not more earnestly express my objections to it than I have on a former occasion. I want to have read a letter from the United States Treasurer upon this subject. Of course it is only the expression of an opinion by that officer, but he is the officer at the head of the Treasury and subtreasury system, and his opinion ought to be considered as that of the officer whose duty it is to know the demands of that branch of the public service of which he is the head.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, May 4, 1886.

DEAR SIR: House bill No. 902 seeks to establish a subtreasury at Louisville, Ky. for the purpose of collecting the public revenues, the national banks in that city are fully competent, as well as for such disbursements as are made at that point. For the purpose of putting the silver dollar or subsidiary silver into circulation the subtreasuries at Cincinnati and Saint Louis for short and the mint at New Orleans for longer distances will be as prompt and economical. The sum proposed as compensation to its officers will be inadequate, as it will cost not less than $15,000 to $20,000 per annum to run a subtreasury with proper reference to the safety of the public moneys. There are at least five of the existing subtreasuries that could be dispensed with (Saint Louis, Baltimore, Cincinnati, New Orleans, and Chicago) and their functions be performed by the national banks in the respective cities with greater economy and very much less risk than under the present system. While they exist, however, the persons intrusted with the heavy responsibilities attached to these offices should receive sufficient compensation.

The duties of the subtreasuries have changed since the passage of the laws authorizing the issue of the various kinds of certificates and exchange and redemption of the silver coinage and paper currency of the country. Each subtreasury is now a bank of issue and redemption. Whether such functions should be performed by these offices is a grave question; but one thing is certain, that the persons who discharge the duties thus imposed should be men thoroughly well qualified, receiving sufficient compensation to induce them to remain, while the duties of their respective offices are performed to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States.

Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have but a word to say in addition to what I have already said in regard to this bill. The House is aware of the fact that there are already subtreasuries established at Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and Chicago, in the Western section of the Union. There is one also at New Orleans and in San Francisco; while in the East there is one at Boston, one at New York, one in Philadelphia, and one in Baltimore. The subtreasury at Cincinnati, which is the least expensive of the whole, costs about $16,500 a year, while that at New York, which is the highest, amounts to about $154,000. The proposed subtreasury, with a much larger body of officers than that named in the bill, as will be seen before this House adjourns should the bill become a law, can not cost the Government less than that at Cincinnati, some four hours distant by rail.

It seems to me, sir, that it would be very unwise for Congress to increase the number of employés in this branch of the service, with the assurance from the head of the subtreasury system already stated in the presence of this House from the Clerk's desk that this increased expenditure is not demanded by any question of public consideration, that the public interests do not require the establishment of this subtreasury at Louisville. If, therefore, public considerations control our legislation and our expenditures of the public money, these expressions from the head of that particular branch of the Government ought to be conclusive.

It was so well said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] on a former occasion, that this side of the House is so committed to severe economy in the expenditures of the public money, that it is committed in favor of retrenchment in all governmental expenditures, that it is to be hoped at least that this side of the House will hesitate before it adds this very considerable body of high-salaried officials to the already overgrown list of public employés.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana very properly states that if there is no use for the public treasury at Louisville it ought not to be established; but he states in the same breath that there is already one at Cincinnati, one at Chicago, one at Saint Louis, one at San Francisco, one at New Orleans, one at Boston, one in New York, one in Philadelphia, and one in Baltimore.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me interrupt the gentleman from Tennessee to ask if he is not aware of the fact that of these subtreasuries, some of them established as late as 1873, three at least can be dispensed with, as shown by the head of that department of the public service without any impairment of the public interests?

Mr. PETTIBONE. I doubt not that may be so. But it must be remembered that in all the South there is only one subtreasury, the one at New Orleans; while a map of our country will show that the converging railroads are centered at Louisville, making the city of Louisville the great city of the South. We have more business there than in any other city.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that consideration should govern, I ask the gentleman why should not Memphis be selected? Is it not a more central point?

Mr. PETTIBONE. For the reason that twenty railroads concentrate at Louisville for one at Memphis.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Why not select Kansas City?

Mr. PETTIBONE. I will not quarrel about that. If there be good reason for a subtreasury there, all right. But our people in Tennessee, in Kentucky, in North Georgia, in North Alabama, in North Mississippi, in Western North Carolina, in Southern Indiana, and in Arkansas have their business relations at the city of Louisville, and it is for the convenience of the business of the population of that whole section of the country that this bill is urged by its friends. If $15,000 or $16,000 a year is more to the people of the United States than the business convenience of five or six millions of people, this bill ought not to pass. But if the business convenience of five or six millions of people is worth more than this amount which has been spoken of, then it ought to pass.

Mr. HEWITT. Will my friend from Tennessee point out in what way the business convenience of those people will be promoted?

Mr. PETTIBONE. You have one in New York. Does it not contribute to the convenience of the people?

Mr. HEWITT. The business convenience of the people of New York is not promoted by its presence.

Mr. PETTIBONE. What good does it then do in New York?

Mr. HEWITT. It does no good to the people of New York.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Then why not abolish it?

Mr. HEWITT. I have no objection to seeing it abolished.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Then all the subtreasuries ought to be abolished, or this bill establishing one at Louisville ought to pass—that is all I have to say.

Mr. BLAND. It is usual when such communications as that which has just been read are sent to this House that they come from the head of the Department. Such a communication ought to come from the Secretary of the Treasury, if there be any objection on the part of the head of the Treasury Department to the passage of this bill.

Gentlemen who will examine the statistics will find that from the New Orleans mint the State of Louisiana absorbed a million and a half of dollars in the first two or three years after the coinage was commenced; simply owing to the fact that the mint was contiguous to the people of that State. Mississippi received over half a million a year, and the surrounding States of the South were supplied from that mint; and it was an aid in putting the money in circulation.

Under the act of last Congress providing for the deposit or transfer of silver coin and subsidiary coin from the mints to the subtreasuries it was intended to place the silver coinage, both the subsidiary and the standard, in a convenient position for circulation. And inasmuch as these subtreasuries are the only means by which these deposits can be made, it does seem to me a matter of convenience and a matter of importance in securing the circulation of this money to have it deposited near the populations who desire it.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, we have a bill pending now for the purpose of issuing certificates on silver, and I understand it is the will or the wish of the majority of this House at least that a larger issue of these certificates be made. Now, under the ruling of the Treasurer, Mr. Jordan, these certificates can not be issued fully. The coin itself is first paid out, is first received by some holder and then redeposited. Now, as to this coin that is all piled up in Washington and in New York, it is almost impossible in the first place to get it in circulation, and in the second place to deposit it anywhere and receive the certificate for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the creation of facilities for the deposit of silver rather increase the amount of silver drawn from circulation? By increasing the facilities for the deposit of silver you will increase the amount of dead currency.

Mr. BLAND. That is a branch of the argument I do not desire to go into at present. It is a question whether the people desire the coin or the certificates. If you have subtreasuries where the coin is to be deposited they can have their choice; otherwise not. But if you fail to deposit the coin where it will go into circulation the people will not have either the coin or the certificates, as is the case to-day with one hundred millions in the Treasury that ought to be in circulation.

Now I say as a means of putting in circulation the coin of the country and the certificates it is a matter of importance to have these subtreasuries where the populations are and where the people want the money. Instead of shipping it from New Orleans to Washington or New York, as was done some time ago, let it be sent to Louisville, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and the other places where you may establish subtreasuries, so that the people can get this coin, and where, if they do not want the coin, they can redeposit it and get certificates. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that Treasurer Jordan has not heretofore indicated a very favorable disposition to put silver into circulation, and hence it may be that he does not favor the subtreasury system and the establishment of subtreasuries throughout the country, but I take it for granted that those Representatives of the people who desire to get this money into circulation and to have means provided for that purpose will not follow Mr. Jordan in his hostility in that respect.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion in connection with what he has just said?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. TAULBEE. In the letter of Mr. Jordan which has been read here by the Clerk he says that "for the purpose of putting the silver dollar or subsidiary silver into circulation the subtreasuries at Cincinnati and Saint Louis for short and the mint at New Orleans for longer distances will be as prompt and economical." As I understand it, his statement conveys the idea that this subtreasury would tend to put silver into circulation; and as in the same letter he objects to the establishment of the subtreasury, I think the inference that that is the foundation of his objection is a very tenable one.

Mr. MORRISON. There is no such inference to be drawn from that letter.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is right the other way.

Mr. MORRISON. He says it can be as well and as economically done without this subtreasury as with it.

Mr. BLAND. I do not yield further, Mr. Chairman. If there was some law (and I think there ought to be) by which the Treasurer or the Secretary of the Treasury would be directed to issue certificates on the coin without its being paid out there might be no great necessity for these subtreasuries, because then the certificates could be issued and could go into circulation; but, under the ruling of Treasurer Jordan himself, no certificate can be used until the coin is first paid out and received by the holder and redeposited. If that be so, we ought to have a subtreasury in every city of fifty thousand people, in order to enable this coin to be deposited and go into circulation, and be redeposited and certificates taken if the people desired them. If they did not so desire, then let the coin be deposited in the centers of population where it can be issued and go into circulation. The coinage of silver is peculiarly situated. The bullion is bought by the Government.

Holders of bullion have no right to go to the Mint and have it coined and put into circulation as they could with gold. The Government exercises a monopoly of the silver coinage by purchasing so much per month and coining it. It is for the Government to put it into circulation or not, and heretofore it seems to have been the policy of the Treasury officials to keep it out of circulation, but it is the policy of the people to institute some means to put it in circulation. There are about eighty millions of money now, standard silver dollars, in the Treasury of the United States that ought to be in circulation. How are you to get it into circulation? By simply coining it and holding it in the Mint and in the Treasury and the subtreasuries in Washington, New York, and the few others throughout the country? Is it not a matter of importance that this money, coined by the Government, shall be sent to the centers of population, where it can be placed in circulation, or where it can be returned and certificates taken if we are to adopt the policy of issuing certificates for silver coin? I would rather, however, see the policy adopted of issuing coin notes on the deposit of gold or silver coin without distinction; I would abolish the whole system of issuing silver and gold certificates separately, and let any holder of gold or silver coin deposit it, receiving a coin certificate, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government in gold or silver. But when you institute a policy of that kind you must provide conveniences for holders of coin to deposit it in the subtreasury, receive their certificates, and take the certificates back to the subtreasury and receive the coin again whenever they desire. The national banks are not in favor of that sort of money, and they will not give it any particular circulation if they can avoid it. They are not the parties to charge with such transactions, and, as against national-bank deposits, I am in favor of subtreasury deposits, so as to take that business away from the national banks.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say only a word about this matter. I am curious to see what anybody can say on that side of the House or on this by way of excuse for a vote for this proposition.

Mr. BLAND. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who seems to be opposed to this bill, whether he claims that the national banks should have this power with reference to the currency, instead of the Government performing the function itself. The gentleman, I believe, is a stockholder in one of these banks. I do not know whether I am correct in that impression.

Mr. CANNON. I am; and I only wish I had a little more stock. I also own a little farm and a mule.

The only gentleman who has thus far presented any excuse for this measure is the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], who proceeds by first throwing his patient into fits and then curing the fits. I think there is no proposition that could possibly come before this House in reference to which the gentleman from Missouri could not see somewhere, through the fog and the cloud, a "silver lining."

Now, what is there in all the gentleman has said? Under the law, at the demand of anybody who has the money to pay for it, the silver dollar is laid down at his door free of transportation charge. That is a fact, and the gentleman ought to know it. I do not know whether he does or not.

Again, suppose you want silver certificates. Any correspondent of any bank, or any individual at any money center, is more than glad to send the silver certificates the moment they are ordered, provided you pay for them. So there is nothing in all that talk of the gentleman.

Now I will tell you all there is in this proposition. A Democratic Treasurer of the United States says that this subtreasury now asked for will be an additional expense and not so safe as the existing depositories. That is his opinion. I am not particularly interested in backing up this Democratic Treasurer; but from what little knowledge I have of business I have no doubt he states the fact. So that the question, after all, resolves itself purely into this—whether we are to establish a subtreasury at Louisville and go on to establish them at every city of ten thousand people throughout the country, as the gentleman from Missouri seems to desire, for the purpose of giving more places for hungry Democrats. That is all there is of it. If gentlemen want to do so they may march up and vote for the bill and provide these places. For one I am not hungering and thirsting to do that thing; and I do not propose to vote for this bill. Of course everybody on either side controls his own vote.

It has been said to me by a number of persons that the parties who very much desire the passage of this bill are very clever people—nice men. I presume that is so; but after all, so far as I am individually concerned, I do not choose to vote for a measure because I would be glad to accommodate this gentleman or that gentleman or the other.

There is no propriety in this bill. I think anybody who understands business understands that. Your Treasurer of the United States says the establishment of this subtreasury will be a useless expense, and that the system here proposed is not so safe as the present system. I commend his opinion to the other side of the House.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If, as the gentleman says, the Treasury Department now "lays silver down at the doors" of these banks why are they asking the passage of a bill to do that?

Mr. CANNON. The law——

Mr. STEELE. The existing law does not do it, I am just informed.

Mr. CANNON. Then I am wrong or the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman who has charge of this bill tells me that this very privilege is now asked so as to avoid the expressage on silver.

Mr. CANNON. I can only state what I know the law to be, which provides that silver shall be delivered without cost of transportation to any one in the United States who desires it. I do not care to stand here and, in addition to having a knowledge of the law myself, furnish my friend from Indiana with that knowledge when apparently he will not receive it.

Mr. STEELE. The gentlemen make assertions without knowing much about the law. I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky what his understanding on that subject is?

Mr. CANNON. There is an appropriation annually for this purpose.

Mr. STEELE. But you fail to appropriate enough, perhaps, because I know of banks in the district I represent that have been refused such benefits. I think they ought to have them for the benefit of their patrons.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the adoption of the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report on Alaska by L. M. Turner be printed, with the necessary illustrations, and that 4,000 additional copies be printed; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution under the direction of the Chief Signal Officer of the United States Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7938) to authorize the Covington and Cincinnati Elevated Railway and Bridge Company to erect a bridge across the Ohio River.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. 6391) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 117) making an appropriation for the extension and enlargement of the United States custom-house at Kansas City, Mo.;

A bill (S. 249) for the payment of Sewell Coulson and Porter, Harrison & Fishback for legal services;

A bill (S. 430) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Terre Haute, Ind.;

A bill (S. 531) to provide for the erection of a public building at La Fayette, Ind.;

A bill (S. 1131) to amend an act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Detroit, Mich., approved March 2, 1885;

A bill (S. 1219) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky;

A bill (S. 1433) for the relief of the Western Miami Indians of Kansas;

A bill (S. 1457) to increase the appropriation for the erection of a public building at Marquette, Mich.;

A bill (S. 1486) to authorize the Denison and Washita Valley Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1550) to provide for an addition to the United States building at Jackson, Miss.;

A bill (S. 1592) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Denver, Col.;

A bill (S. 1611) for the erection of a public building at Fort Dodge, Iowa;

A bill (S. 1919) to authorize the purchase of additional ground adjoining the United States court-house and post-office building at Saint Paul, Minn., the erection of a bonded warehouse, and the repair of the existing United States building at said place, and appropriating money therefor;

A bill (S. 2058) to complete the public building at Harrisonburg, Va., and

A bill (S. 2191) to complete repairs and alterations of the public building at Parkersburg, W. Va.

Mr. HEWITT. I did not count the number of public buildings authorized by the action of the Senate just returned to the House by its Secretary; but, sir, if there be good reason for putting a subtreasury at Louisville there will be found equally good reasons for having one in every one of the public buildings on this long list.

Mr. Speaker, this proposition proceeds on an entire error as to the subtreasury system. These subtreasuries are not established for the convenience of the people. It is an abuse of the original purpose for which they were established when they are made a convenience to the people. In other words, they can only be made convenient to the people by converting them into banks of issue and deposit, for which they were never designed. If there is anything against which this side of the House is committed by tradition, by principle, by repeated declarations in platforms and otherwise, it is against any union of this Government with the banking system of the country and any usurpation of banking power by the Government.

The subtreasury was established solely for the convenience of the Treasury of the United States, to keep its property safely, as a place of deposit for its property; and every function it performs beyond that, except disbursements in payment of its debts, is an abuse and a dangerous abuse.

The great difficulty we have to-day in this country in regard to the use of currency is due to the fact the subtreasuries of the United States have been converted into a species of national bank. I do not mean by that banks belonging to the national banking association, but a national bank of the kind against which the Democratic party waged undying warfare, and which finally, under the lead of Andrew Jackson, was destroyed.

Mr. BLAND. Let me ask the gentleman from New York whether the subtreasury system was not established for the very purpose of destroying the national banks?

Mr. HEWITT. It was.

Mr. BLAND. Now let me ask the gentleman further whether the national banks will hold silver for the purpose of putting it into circulation? Can you show a national bank anywhere in this country which will take ten millions of silver and hold it for the purpose of putting it into circulation?

Mr. HEWITT. No, sir; nowhere. But I will produce, any time the gentleman wants it, the engagement of every bank in the city of New York to put into circulation every silver dollar the gentleman will furnish them for that purpose. The trouble with the gentleman and his constituents is they have no more silver dollars than they want for circulation, and they will not take them and put them on deposit in the national banks of the city of New York.

Mr. BLAND. I prefer my constituents, and not the gentleman nor the national banks, to determine the question whether we have all the circulation of silver dollars we want or not. Why, sir, we can take four times more than we have now.

The SPEAKER. There is too much confusion in the House, and gentlemen will resume their seats and preserve order.

Mr. HEWITT. I will only answer, as was well answered by the gentleman from Illinois, that if anybody wants silver dollars and is willing to pay for them he has only to ask for them, for under the last sundry civil appropriation bill there is this provision:

For the transportation of silver coin, $50,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries free of charge silver coin when requested so to do.

Mr. BLAND. What amount?

Mr. HEWITT. Any amount.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that is the exchange of one form of money for another. What we want is to get an extra amount into circulation, and not to change paper for silver or to swap dollars. No one can be deceived by that argument. We want to get into circulation more money than is in circulation now; but what the gentleman refers to is merely an exchange of one form of dollar for another form of dollar without adding anything to the circulation.

Mr. HEWITT. I will yield to questions to everybody if they will only make them all at once and then wait until I can answer them. But it is difficult to answer speeches of that sort injected into the belly of my speech. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HEWITT. Certainly.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The gentleman from New York says any man can get silver dollars who wants them. The trouble is there are men in this country who do not want silver dollars, and they should be compelled to take them.

Mr. HEWITT. Ah! [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There are men who, with bonds due on call to-day and with $60,000,000 in the Treasury which should be paid out on those bonds—there are bondholders who do not want their bonds to be exchanged for silver dollars. And why should they not be compelled to exchange those bonds, while we are compelled to take those dollars and nothing else?

Mr. HEWITT. Now, Mr. Speaker, my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] says we ought to be compelled to take the silver dollars whether we want to take them or not. I wish to state to him that I was compelled to take four of them this morning.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa (from his seat). Served you right. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT. Here they are [holding them up]. [Cries of "Hand them over!" "Pass them around!" "Pay them out!" "Disburse them!" &c., and laughter.] And, Mr. Speaker, this remarkable readiness which is exhibited here among my impecunious colleagues on this floor [laughter] to relieve me of this silver burden is very significant of the condition of this country to-day, where everybody would take a silver dollar promptly if offered for nothing and be glad to get it, but if they have to pay for it they prefer some other kind of currency, more convenient to carry and quite as good to spend.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] wants to afford facilities for what? Is it the distribution of these silver dollars, or is it for the reception of these silver dollars in order to lock them up more completely? Undoubtedly for the latter purpose; and if for the latter, how can this proposition give effect to the views of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], who wants to put them in circulation? The truth is, the more you multiply the places of deposit for silver dollars, the more rapidly they will be deposited and lie dead.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But there will be certificates issued instead if they are deposited.

Mr. HEWITT. I hope so; at present, however, the certificates are limited in amount to $10.

Now, I know of no good reason whatever why I should be compelled to carry these four silver dollars in my pocket when I would much prefer to have one and two dollar bills.

Mr. SYMES. Will you support the silver-certificate bill, which will accomplish what you want in that direction?

Mr. HEWITT. I have introduced a bill myself and it is pending before the Committee on Banking and Currency, but has not been reported, by which the Government of the United States shall be compelled to give a gold dollar for a silver dollar whenever it is presented at the Treasury Department. That bill will afford relief.

Mr. SYMES. I ask will you support the silver-certificate bill before the House?

Mr. HEWITT. I do not know what the bill is, except in a general way; but I will say to the gentleman that I am ready and willing to support any bill which establishes and perpetuates the equality of the dollars of the United States, whether they be gold, silver, or paper. [Applause.]

Mr. SYMES. Then, if you do, you will have to revolutionize your record in that regard for the last ten years.

Mr. HEWITT. On the contrary, I have never ceased in my efforts to put and keep the currency of the country on a par with gold, and it will be an evil day for the country when this parity is destroyed, as it will be sooner or later by the continued coinage of overvalued silver dollars.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. WILLIS rose.

Mr. HEWITT. Is my time limited?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has exhausted the five minutes.

Mr. HEWITT. I am sorry; I did not know that I was speaking under the five-minute rule; my time was largely occupied by interruptions, and I had not concluded what I had desired to say.

Mr. EDEN was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. HEWITT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is not subject to interruption without his consent, and will proceed.

Mr. HEWITT. I am perfectly aware that the interruptions were because of my own foolish good nature.

But, Mr. Speaker, I got up to say something totally different from what I have said, and it is this: These subtreasuries being established for the convenience of the United States, the officers of the Treasury best know where they want them for that purpose. The radical trouble they experience is, however, to secure competent officers to fill these places at the salaries which are established by law; and in the city of New York within three months past it was almost impossible to get a man of sufficient responsibility to take charge of the subtreasury; and the subtreasurer there now in office is appealing to Congress to raise the salaries of his subordinates, because at the rates fixed by the law capable men can not be had for the service.

Every time therefore you establish an additional subtreasury you will increase that difficulty; and I want to warn my Democratic friends that every effort of this sort is simply the imposing of a new charge upon the Treasury and an additional burden upon the tax-payers of the country. This bill proposes to establish a subtreasury at Louisville not because it is needed for the public convenience, as we are informed in the letter of the Treasurer, but simply because it will provide patronage to the extent of $16,000 annually, and lead to large expenditures for vaults now and buildings in the future.

Mr. WILLIS (from his seat). The bill limits it to $9,500.

Mr. HEWITT. But the incidental expenses will run it up to at least $16,000, which is the smallest sum that any of these subtreasuries are run for. As the continual dropping of water will wear away a stone, so these propositions to spend a little here and to spend a little there until the sum total is enough to frighten every thinking man will finally exhaust the patience of the people.

I have sat here day after day and heard propositions for the expenditure of public money, running up into large sums, constantly made where there is no public necessity to demand it, and I wish to warn my friends that this can not go on in this way without making the burden of taxation unbearable. This is as good a place to stop the unnecessary expenditures as any other, for here is the testimony of the Treasurer of the United States, charged with the care of its funds, to the effect that it is a useless expenditure; that it will add nothing to public convenience and afford no protection to the Treasury. But, worse than that, it may be an enormous risk to the Treasury; for, Mr. Speaker, when money is deposited in the national depositories the banks are responsible for its safe-keeping to the Government, and they are required to give security for the deposits of the funds of the United States in the bonds of the United States, so that there is no possibility of loss.

The subtreasury in New York to-day is only safe from a mob, if a mob should ever arise in that city, by reliance on the police and on the armed forces of the United States that are kept in readiness on Governor's Island for its protection. Wherever you build a subtreasury you must have a guard in the neighborhood. There is always the risk of violence and of robbery.

Mr. WILLIS. We have a guard at Louisville.

Mr. HEWITT. My friend says they have a guard at Louisville——

Mr. WILLIS. And can wipe New York out. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT. I have no doubt on the question of passing this bill you will wipe the votes of New York out, but you will not wipe out the warning which I now venture to give the gentleman, that he and his Democratic associates who vote for this bill will also be wiped out when the next election comes, and the power to expend the public money uselessly will no longer be allowed to reside in a Democratic majority. We came into power because of Republican extravagance; let us not lose it because of Democratic improvidence and a reckless disregard of our pledges to the people.

Mr. WILLIS. I have been astounded at the arguments and the facts upon which the opposition to this bill has been raised, and by no statement have I been more astounded than that of my honored friend [Mr. HEWITT] who has just taken his seat. I would hesitate to express any opinion on finance against his if I did not have before me the law creating subtreasuries and also the report of that very Treasurer whose opinion has been introduced here to control the judgment of the House upon a unanimous report of the committee of this House. The gentleman says that a subtreasury is confined merely to the deposit of silver. The act passed in 1846——

Mr. HEWITT. I beg to state I made no such statement. The gentleman may as well deal fairly with me.

Mr. WILLIS. I stand corrected. Will the gentleman say what he did state?

Mr. HEWITT. I said the substreasuries were established for the care of the funds in the custody of the United States.

Mr. WILLIS. I have before me the law which states it differently; and I have before me the last report of the Treasury Department which puts it differently. And if I can not, let me say here, show by the reports of this very Department the necessity of this subtreasury I appeal to every gentleman on this floor to cast his vote against it.

As to the duties of the subtreasuries, here is what the original law said. The act of August 6, 1846, said the subtreasuries were "for the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public funds."

But what further? Since these coinage acts have been passed the sphere of the subtreasury, the duties and responsibilities of the subtreasury, as we all know, and no one better than the distinguished gentleman from New York, have been entirely changed, enlarged, and increased.

What does the Treasurer say? On page 485 of the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury he says this:

> The subtreasurers of the United States, having had their duties and responsibilities largely increased through the issue of the gold, silver, and legal-tender certificates and the issue and redemption of the standard silver dollar and the fractional coins—

And in view of the enlarged sphere of the subtreasury what does he further say—> it is respectfully submitted whether a scheme for a reorganization of the respective offices should not receive the attention of Congress.

And why? Listen, gentlemen of the House of Representative, listen to the reason that your Treasurer gives for a reorganization and change of your subtreasuries. What does he say on that point?

> Persons occupying the positions of messengers and laborers are now engaged in handling, counting, shipping money, and doing other clerical labor.

Is that the position in which the Treasury of the United States wants to stand before the tax-payers and representatives of the people? Are we to allow messengers and laborers to conduct these important pecuniary transactions connected with the Treasury Department?

Mr. HEWITT. I ask the gentleman how will the establishment of a subtreasury at Louisville change that?

Mr. WILLIS. They demand additional clerks, and we propose to give them additional clerks. It is true they will not be located in New York. But I can say we will find in Louisville men just as competent in finance to attend to this clerical work connected with the subtreasury as the gentleman can find within the limits of Wall street.

He says there is need of more clerical force. The Secretary of the Treasury says the same thing. There is not clerical force to attend to the duties of the subtreasury.

And further, as to vault-room, what does he say? And I challenge any gentleman to deny any statement I make. I welcome interruption. I say in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury we find the astounding fact that every subtreasury in the United States except the mint at New Orleans is to-day full to overflowing with silver and gold, and there is to-day yonder in your Committee on Appropriations a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury asking an appropriation of $100,000—for what? To enlarge the vaults at Washington and New York. Can we not have vaults in this building at Louisville? And permit me to say, as I have mentioned the word "building," and as the gentleman from New York referred to the building bills which have been brought in, that this bill neither now nor hereafter contemplates the construction of a public building.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. I ask some gentleman to yield me a few minutes.

Mr. ROGERS was recognized, and yielded to Mr. WILLIS.

Mr. WILLIS. Thanking the gentleman, I would state that this does not now nor hereafter contemplate any public building. We have a building there that will last for a hundred years, and this is simply a proposition to build a vault in an existing building and to provide for four or five clerks at the enormous cost of $9,560. That is the bill that has evoked these vaticinations of ruin. That is the bill that has called forth the Treasurer of the United States to the rescue. That is the amount that has caused my friend from New York to presume that a cyclone will sweep over the Democratic party in the next November elections. Sir, if I can not, upon the facts presented by the Treasury Department, defend this bill, I want it defeated.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a single question?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has stated that the Treasurer is demanding an increased force of clerks in the subtreasury and an increase of salaries. Will the establishment of this subtreasury at Louisville diminish the grounds for that demand?

Mr. WILLIS. I answer the gentleman that the subtreasury system is an entirety, and that if you have five clerks in Louisville it lessens the necessity for five clerks in Washington or New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will not lessen the expense a clerk nor a dollar.

Mr. WILLIS. And further, you can get the clerks cheaper in Louisville than you can in and around your central cities.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the extraordinary condition of your mints and assay offices. Here is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. What does he say? That to-day there are unlawfully—that is the word—that to-day there are unlawfully in the mints and assay offices of the United States $148,000,000, and he says that there is no correct report made to him by the mint officers, and that he does not know to-day, officially, whether there is even one dollar in those mints and assay offices instead of $148,000,000. What further does he say? He says that they have relied for safety heretofore upon the police regulations of the cities in which subtreasuries are located. Upon that point he says:

> As a matter of fact, still further dependence is placed on the legal preservation of public order and the efficiency of local police, and confidence in such personal, as distinguished from structural, means of safety seems happily to have suffered no relax from serious disturbances of public order. Yet it may well be asked, should even this long immunity from popular violence be accepted as a guarantee against the future occurrence of anything of the kind in large cities like New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans?

He could not to-day write that sentence. Since that was written riots have occurred in three of the subtreasury cities of the country. Ah, but the gentleman [Mr. HEWITT] says we have a military force in New York. I would say to the gentleman that we have a military force in Louisville, organized and supported by leading citizens there, which has been in existence for several years. But is it prudent, even from this point of view, to pile up all our money in the city of Washington or the city of New York? In view of the disturbances that have occurred, and in view of this statement made by the Director of the Mint, is it not prudent even from this point of view to distribute that money? Who does not know that a force of one thousand men could capture Washington to-day, even against the resistance of all the brigadier-generals and major-generals who sit around me? Yet the gentleman from New York says, "Go on; pile up your money here; pile it up in New York; you people of the West and South do not need it." He asks, "What need is there for a subtreasury at Louisville?" I say to him: Here is a petition signed by every bank in the city of Louisville, twenty-two in number, which declares that they need it for the transfer and exchange of silver; that they need it to pay the pensioners. One of the pension agencies is located there; they draw their checks on New York; they make mistakes; and, as they state, the pensioners suffer.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to change the verdict which will be shortly recorded in favor of this bill. I rise chiefly to congratulate those eminent reformers on the other side of the House upon the tight command they have of their party. I call attention of the gentleman from Illinois to it, the leader of the House [Mr. MORRISON]; I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL]; I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the economist; I call the attention to it of my friend and colleague from New York, whom I always delight to honor [Mr. HEWITT]. How well, gentlemen, you hold your party in hand when there is a bill pending before the House to create a little more patronage for your party! Where are those resolutions that you formulated at your last national convention and that you talked about so much before the people, pledging the reduction of public expenditure and the abolition of unnecessary offices? What do you propose to do with these places that you have made for the people, the dear people, whose money you would under no circumstances waste? Is this bill that is now pending, and is your action upon it to-day, an earnest of what your future policy will be in the matter of economy? Your Secretary of the Treasury has said that this expenditure is unnecessary. He has told you that $370,000,000 are to-day tied up and kept from circulation by this system of subtreasuries. He has told you that in Cincinnati seven millions and more are held which can not get into circulation because of the subtreasury there; he has told you that there are ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen millions in Chicago, and I suppose twenty millions in New Orleans, and all because of this subtreasury system.

You stand here, some of you, saying that you want more currency; that prices are forced down on account of increase in the purchasing power of money. That is the argument you frequently use, yet you come in here to-day and, despite all the "oppression" of the people because they have not money enough, you propose, in violation of your pledges in convention and on the stump, to vote for a bill looking to the expenditure of $20,000, very likely $30,000 a year—and in the end half a million dollars for a public building—because there is a little patronage involved in it for the Democratic party.

Mr. WILLIS rose.

Mr. HISCOCK. Through this bill you hope to be able to pacify the Democracy in the State of Kentucky. There is not enough of official patronage there to "go round;" and this bill is brought in as a measure of relief, to provide more patronage to pacify the disaffected and the needy; and because certain Democrats on the other side appear as apologists and defenders of this bill, the remainder of you will rush between the tellers and vote for it. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNHAM obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. I will now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] if he wants to ask a question. As I said, Mr. Speaker, I do not take part in the discussion of this question with any expectation of changing the result. I know that has already been determined. I know that on the other side of the House a few men of national reputation as reformers will mouth their protestations briefly against this bill; but can it be that they are so shorn of influence, can it be that the premier, the king-maker, the very Warwick of the Democracy is so powerless as to be unable to stem this tide of extravagance? Can it be that our distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, with that great State at his back, is powerless to resist these encroachments, these raids upon the public Treasury? How many members from Indiana on the other side of the House will follow our friend from that State [Mr. HOLMAN] in his vote against this bill? I shall watch the record with interest, for I hope you will give us a vote by yeas and nays. I want to see the following that our friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] will have in his opposition to this measure. He is strong, very strong in national conventions, and I want to see in what estimation he is held by his colleagues on this floor when in tame phrases he advises economy and urges that we should let the public Treasury alone. I hope at least that the Democracy from the State of New York, for its own credit, will wheel into line under the leadership of my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. You will do the same, will you not?

Mr. HISCOCK. I answer no; I will not wheel into line under the leadership of my friend from New York. I thank Heaven that I am strong enough with my constituency to adopt my own policy, which will ever be to vote against bills of this character. It is unnecessary for my friend from Kansas to insinuate that it is necessary for me to receive oracles from any other source than my own constituency, by virtue of whose warrant I hold a seat on this floor.

Gentlemen on the other side have told us there is a "silver lining" to this measure. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has promptly replied that silver is already laid down at your doors free of expense for transportation. It has been pointed out here that this subtreasury system ties up money, keeps it out of circulation, and thus oppresses the people about whom we hear so much on this floor. But, notwithstanding all this, there are four or five offices to be created; there are some positions as keepers of public buildings; there are some people who wish to sweep out and clean them; there is some petty patronage; and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, not satisfied with the passage of the river and harbor bill, misses nothing; he wants this patronage; and almost as an amendment to that bill this legislation is to be forced through the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized long enough to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to be recognized myself for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes, I suppose so.

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman from New York seems to put this bill on the ground——

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose if the question is asked me I shall have all the time I want in which to answer it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TAULBEE. I propose to yield to the gentleman such time as is accorded to me for the purpose of answering the question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I will answer it.

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman seems to put the merits of this bill on the ground of patronage.

Mr. HISCOCK. Ground of what?

Mr. TAULBEE. Of patronage. He has labored during the time allotted him to show the fact that the friends of this bill are induced to support it by the hope of getting places for Democrats. Now, if that is his argument and his position I desire to ask why it was on the first day of this month he cast his vote against a resolution to investigate certain of his party friends who are receiving salaries from the Government and making no return therefor? I desire to know why he did so.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what the gentleman refers. I can not tell that, but it is very possible I may have voted against a resolution to investigate my party friends. If I did, I will tell you one good reason I had for doing it. In my judgment the Democrats have on their hands enough to do in investigating their own party friends. [Laughter and applause.] If the Democratic party will confine itself for the balance of the period it shall be in power to creating committees to investigate what they have done even up to date, and to hold it in check for the future, it will have discharged its full duty to the people, and if it results in pure administration of the Democratic party it will accomplish much more than I expect of it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope not. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I hope the gentleman will yield to me for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; and I will yield for four and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat amusing to this side of the House, and I presume also to the country, to observe the mental agony and physical contortion exhibited by the gentlemen on the other side of the House while they are straining at this little gnat of Democratic extravagance, notwithstanding the fact that for the past twenty-five years they have been swallowing the huge camels of Republican wastefulness. [Laughter and applause.] When I came here in the Forty-fourth Congress the Committee on Appropriations, under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], began to reform abuses and to reduce the enormous expenditures of the preceding years of Republican rule. During that Congress, while that effort was being made, the Republican members of this House stood as a solid phalanx and resisted every effort looking to such reduction.

I remember on one occasion I was on a conference committee which sat in the month of August for two weeks resisting efforts of the Senate and the Republican side of the House to increase one bill to the extent of $5,000,000.

I heard no protest then from the gentlemen on the other side of the House against that extravagance or any word in favor of curtailing the expenses of Republican rule. But, sir, the Democratic party as then represented persisted in making these reductions and remained here until the 15th of August for the purpose of securing the accomplishment of their object. During two years of that Congress we reduced the expenses of the Government over $60,000,000 below what they had been for the two years of the preceding Republican rule. During all this period there was no effort upon the part of the gentlemen on the other side to co-operate with us, but on the contrary they resisted every proposed reduction in the unnecessary expenditure of the public money.

We were told then by the Republican leaders in this House that the Democratic party was endeavoring "to starve the Government;" that our proposed reductions would cripple the public service, if not destroy the Government outright. But we went forward and reduced expenditures to the enormous extent to which I have already stated. These reductions not only did not cripple or even embarrass the Government, but on the contrary they gave confidence and security to the country and increased power to the Democratic party. It was Democratic economies that opened the way to the resumption of specie payments, and made it possible for the Government to pass through that trying ordeal with safety and establish our financial stability throughout this country and the whole world.

The gentlemen on the other side of the House discovered in the consular and diplomatic bill the other day a proposed increase of $800 in an item at the Turkish legation. This proposed increase in appropriations seemed to startle that whole side of the House at the extent of Democratic extravagance as exhibited by that item. And when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], who is now anxious to get the question to a vote, proposed to supply the growing wants of a great region of country by establishing an additional subtreasury in Louisville, gentlemen on the other side resist the proposition and assert that it is another evidence of Democratic extravagance.

Mr. WILLIS. I demand the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 102, noes 38.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon the passage of the bill I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 62, not voting 102; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the title I suppose of this bill has not been adopted, and upon that subject I want to observe, before the debate is closed, that the leaders on the other side of the House, and especially the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], do not seem to have been able to control the votes of that side of the House any better or to any greater effect than the leaders on this have done. Honors, therefore, seem to be easy, and I trust the gentleman from New York will remember this fact in his forthcoming canvass in New York.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House for discussion.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Illinois having been allowed to make that remark, I ought to have the privilege of responding. I desire to state to the gentleman from Illinois that he always does well when he acts upon his own individual promptings and not from the inspirations of others. But what is a more shameless sight than for the Democracy with 40 majority in this House [cries of "Regular order!"] to charge any responsibility for this legislation upon this side of the House? [Loud cries of "Regular order!"] You organized the House, and you have 40 majority, and you are responsible for its legislation.

Mr. WILLIS. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is no question as to the title of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I demand the regular order.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1361) granting a pension to Nira D. Gwynne.

INDIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call up for consideration the bill providing for the appointment of an Indian commission.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill called up by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6973) to provide for the appointment of a commission to inspect and report on the condition of Indians, Indian affairs, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has twelve minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose only to occupy a moment to call the attention of the House to the fact already mentioned that this bill has been prepared by the Interior Department under the Secretary of the Interior; that in pursuance of the policy announced by the President touching Indian matters in his last annual message, the bill contemplates the appointment of a commission, detailed from the Army and the Interior Department, to adjust the entire Indian question so far as the relations of the Indians to the land are concerned and the manner in which it shall be held.

The measure would seem to be almost indispensable as a preliminary proceeding in the adjustment of the relation which the Indians are to occupy in future to the lands, and the manner in which they shall be held, and the extent to which those lands shall be held by the Government in trust and disposed of for the benefit of the Indians.

This commission of course would supersede the commission already provided in connection with the Chippewa lands of Minnesota and the Indian lands in the northern portion of Montana. This commission would supersede that one, inasmuch as the creation of that commission is left discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior. It would also obviate the necessity for the commission proposed by the bill for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma.

It is believed by those having charge of Indian matters that the details provided for by the bill will result in the creation of a better commission than if it were to be appointed from civil life. I believe I have nothing further to add at this time. There are quite a number of amendments pending, some of which are entirely satisfactory, and others of which may be offered. If I have any time left I reserve it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would be very glad if the House would consent, inasmuch as the subject I presume is well understood, that any amendments to be offered may be offered at once, and then that the previous question shall be allowed on the bill and pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. When the bill was formerly under consideration it was postponed by the House until to-day. The question then pending was on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] for the previous question on the bill and pending amendments. A quorum not having voted, the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] were appointed tellers.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question, as important amendments will be offered to the bill, which will involve necessarily a good deal of discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by consent before the postponement of the bill a large number of amendments were sent up to be printed in the RECORD. They are not pending unless it shall be agreed they shall be so considered; but there were some amendments, all that were allowed by the rules, actually pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it was understood that by unanimous consent all the amendments sent up were to be considered as actually pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds by an examination of the RECORD that a quorum not having voted on the demand for the previous question the gentleman from Indiana did not insist on further count, and the previous question was not ordered.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I had offered an amendment to the text of the bill which was pending by agreement between the gentleman from Indiana and myself.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it was understood by unanimous consent that all amendments might be submitted and understood as pending. If there is any doubt about it I will make that request now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks that all the amendments offered heretofore be considered as pending. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLMAN. And all other amendments that are germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had offered an amendment to the first section.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I understand there has been no limitation to the debate.

The SPEAKER. There has not been thus far. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to the first section.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "authorized," insert "and directed," making it read: "That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a commission."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it in order to move an amendment to this bill?

The SPEAKER. By the consent of the House just given, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] can send up his amendment and it will be considered as pending,

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not desire to interfere with the amendments already sent up; but I want to move at the proper time to strike out the sixth section of the bill, and to add as a new section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the following amendment proposed by Mr. HOLMAN:

In line 6, section 1, fill the blank with the word "major;" so that it will read: "To consist of six persons, three of whom shall be detailed from the officers of the Army not below the rank of major."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following amendment proposed by Mr. DORSEY:

In section 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "appointed from civil life or;" so that it will read: "Who shall report to the Secretary of the Interior for duty, the other members to be detailed from officers in the service of the Department of the Interior."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill as it now stands provides for a detail of three Army officers of a grade not lower than that of a major, the other three commissioners to be appointed from civil life or detailed from the Interior Department. The proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska is to strike out the power to select from civil life, so that the commissioners would be detailed either from the Army or from the Interior Department.

Now I think that, as a matter of fact, it will be found desirable to make the detail of the three civilians from the Interior Department. It is quite manifest that a very proper appointment would be that of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs as a member of this commission, but still it might occur that some gentlemen peculiarly adapted to the position and not connected with the Indian Department might be suggested, in which event it seems to me desirable that the power of the President to go outside of the Department ought to be retained.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was under consideration before I offered an amendment to the first section, which will be found in the RECORD, and which I ask to have reported.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

The President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to reorganize the board of Indian commissioners, so as to make it to consist of seven persons, two of whom may be detailed from the officers of the Army, who shall report to the Secretary of the Interior for duty, the other members to be appointed from the existing board, from civil life, or detailed from officers in the service of the Department of the Interior. And when said board of Indian commissioners shall be so appointed, the organization and functions of the present board of Indian commissioners shall cease and determine. It shall be the duty of the said reorganized board of Indian commissioners to perform all duties heretofore intrusted to and performed by the board of Indian commissioners; and they shall inspect all goods and supplies purchased for the Indian service, and advise the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to the purchase of such goods and supplies. It shall also be the duty of said commissioners, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to inspect from time to time, as he may require, the condition of the Indians of the various tribes and bands on the different reservations under the care, control, or jurisdiction of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is equivalent to a motion to strike out the first section and insert what has been read, and before that can be voted upon all the amendments to the text of the first section must be disposed of.

The Clerk will report the first amendment to the first section.

The Clerk read the amendment [proposed by Mr. COWLES] as follows:

Strike out in lines 7 and 8 the words "appointed from civil life or."

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, that amendment proposed by me is in effect very nearly the same as the one proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY], but it goes further. It proposes to strike out the provision for the appointment and the appropriation for the payment of the salary and expenses of the persons to be chosen from civil life. Now, sir, I do not see the necessity of selecting persons from civil life to be appointed on this commission. I think that officers in the Interior Department who have charge of Indian affairs, and officers in the Army who are brought in contact with Indians on the frontier, and who, in the execution of their duties, become familiar with the working of the Department in relation to the Indians, should know more of these matters than any civilians, and be better adapted to service on this commission. Furthermore, they are already in the pay of the Government, and no additional expenditure will be required except for their traveling expenses, if even that be necessary. This amendment, therefore, is in the line of economy, for I do not see the necessity of creating new offices for the purpose of this commission. With regard to the policy of the commission itself I have nothing to say. My learned and distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is very familiar with all subjects appertaining to the Indians, but I do not see the need of appointing anybody from civil life upon the commission when we have men who are already in the employ of the Government receiving regular salaries, and who will perform this duty as well as any man that can be selected from civil life.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I can not agree with the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES]. This bill is a very important and far-reaching one. The powers conferred upon this commission have never been equaled in the history of our Indian legislation. Powers are conferred relating to scores of millions of acres of the public domain, and in fact the whole Indian policy is really placed under the care of this commission and of the Secretary of the Interior. Now, I think the people of the United States would not be willing to put all these vast interests entirely in the hands of Army officers. However well informed those officers may be, however competent they may be, their relation to the Army and their isolation from civil life makes them, whether justly or not, obnoxious to the criticism that they have been so separated from the people that they have ceased to sympathize with them. They have been brought in contact with frontiersmen, with cattle syndicates, with speculators, with everybody except the people of the United States, and I for one would not be willing to see those vast interests placed in their hands alone. I respect the officers of the Army; I make no charge against them; all I say is that I, as a civilian, would not be willing to intrust these immense interests to their hands alone. I am perfectly willing that they should constitute one-half of this board, but the other half, I think, should be chosen from civil life, and if there is not enough in this measure to justify paying those commissioners for their services, then clearly the bill ought not to pass. If there is not sufficient utility in this proposition to justify a reasonable expenditure of money to pay these men for their services, the bill ought not to become a law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] will bear in mind that in the appointment of a commission of so much importance, to be intrusted with the examination of this whole question, involving 137,000,000 acres of lands, it is very likely to occur that some gentleman peculiarly adapted to service upon the commission may be outside of the Interior Department; and in such a case I submit the President should have power to go outside of that Department in making the designation.

Mr. COWLES. My proposition is to confine these appointments not to Army officers exclusively, but to officers of the Interior Department who have charge of Indian affairs, and to Army officers, who, I take it, are as honorable men and as capable of performing these duties as any persons in civil life. I do not understand this commission to be a court, as one gentleman has said——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I did not say that.

Mr. COWLES. It is simply a commission to obtain information in regard to Indian affairs and report to Congress such measures as in the opinion of the commission should be adopted for the benefit of the Indian service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. There is no intimation that it is to be a court. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] goes on the assumption that three competent persons can be spared from the Interior Department. I do not know that such will be the case.

Mr. COWLES. Not in summer time?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, we can not tell. This ought to be a continuous commission. I admit that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior would be a very proper member of this commission; and I have no doubt if the commission be authorized one or the other of these will be appointed. But it may be found that no three gentlemen eminently qualified for the service can be found in the Interior Department or can be spared from their positions there. Hence I think we ought to leave this discretion with the President.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I think so.

Mr. COWLES. I see no necessity for the creation of new officers.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to one defect which it occurs to me is found in his bill. The bill, so far as I have examined, contains no provision indicating what is to be the life of this commission—whether it is to be a continuous commission existing during the life of the administration or is merely to continue until it sees fit to make a report. I would like information on that point. I find that the fifth section of the bill contemplates allowing to these commissioners per diem pay and traveling expenses. Now, my question is, if the commission shall be appointed how long will it continue to exist and how long before its members will go out of office?

Mr. HOLMAN. The commission will last as long as the appropriation lasts—not longer. The appropriation is simply for the current year. If the services of the commission should be required longer Congress, of course, at its next session will make the necessary appropriation. It is impossible to tell now how long such a commission will be required. We can not now determine how long it will take to carry through the various negotiations with the different tribes of Indians. All that we can do now is to appropriate for the current year, making no provision for further duration of the commission. If Congress at its next session should find it necessary to continue the commission the appropriation will no doubt be made.

Mr. NELSON. This, then, will be equivalent to the establishment of an annual office with a per diem compensation?

Mr. HOLMAN. As to the civilians appointed outside of the Interior Department there will be of course a per diem compensation. But the commission will exist simply so long as Congress shall keep it in existence by the appropriation of the annual sum necessary for its support.

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman will allow me another question. Is there anything in the bill that will prevent the members of the commission, or those of them who will be entitled to per diem compensation, from getting pay for the entire year?

Mr. HOLMAN. Those who are appointed outside of the Interior Department, if any such should be appointed, will receive $10 per day; and this appropriation is made on that basis for one year.

Mr. NELSON. That will be at the rate of at least $3,000 a year, exclusive of traveling expenses?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. And the bill may involve the creation of three new offices, with compensation at the rate of $3,000 a year and traveling expenses?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. And this commission is to have no other power than simply to investigate and report?

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman examines the bill he will find that while such is the limitation of power, yet the negotiations with these various tribes, the investigation of the whole subject of their lands, the question of vesting those lands in the Indians in severalty, the disposition of lands for the benefit of the Indians—these and similar questions cover a wide field. It has heretofore been thought necessary to confer upon the Secretary of the Interior the power to appoint for the gentleman's own State a commission of three persons upon the same basis as that embraced in this bill. The present measure, as I have sought to explain, seeks to supersede that commission and to cover the whole field by a single commission, instead of having several different bodies of this character.

Mr. COWLES. I believe the gentleman from Indiana has served upon one of these expeditions?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWLES. I would like to know what that expedition cost the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. About $4,200.

Mr. COWLES. Why, then, appropriate in this bill $10,000 for those members of the commission selected from civil life?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me explain to the gentleman that the commission of which I had the honor to be a member was occupied for three months and a half; and I think it was deemed quite an economical commission. It was composed of five members, and was accompanied by a sergeant-at-arms and a clerk. All these were salaried officers; no salaries were paid. Four thousand two hundred dollars was the sum expended for traveling expenses and for a stenographer.

Mr. COWLES. That is what I propose to do, to have them appointed from salaried officers now, so as to avoid any additional expense.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. If members of the House will examine the bill they will find every line confers power either upon the commission itself or upon the Secretary of the Interior. I repeat, sir, there is nothing like it in the whole history of Indian legislation.

I say in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that in my judgment this commission, if ever appointed, can not discharge the duty imposed upon it by this bill in ten years. It is evidently intended to place the whole Indian service and all that pertains to the Indians, including their lands, including, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has said, 137,000,000 acres of land under this commission and under the Secretary of the Interior, subject in some instances to the approval of Congress and in others not. I do not think we can find men in the Interior Department who can be spared from their duties now at the desk and from their present positions who would be satisfactory to the House and to the American nation as commissioners.

If this bill is to become a law—and I have extreme doubt whether it should ever become the law—but if it is to become the law the largest minded men to be found by the President of the United States, the most comprehensive, the best acquainted with the Indian policy, the public land policy, and the wants of the people generally should be selected as the civilian portion of that commission. I would be unwilling to confine it to the Army or to the present employés of the Interior Department, because certainly the Secretary of the Interior can not be spared from his duties to enter upon this new field of labor nor can the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I know of no one else in the Interior Department who would be satisfactory to the people if selected. It is important when the commission is appointed that the rights of the public should be taken care of, and the whole transaction should be one of breadth and force.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] and of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to some of the provisions of the bill. They do not seem to be understood. The object of this commission is a permanent one; that is to say, it extends to the solution of the Indian problem; and I undertake to say it can not be accomplished in less time than ten years. And if it can be done in twenty-five years it is time we were beginning to do it now, so that we may have an end to it some time in the future.

I am opposed, therefore, to incorporating in this bill a provision covering any officer of the Government, unless it may be officers of the Army, whose duties may enable them to devote a large portion of their time to carrying out the purpose of the commission.

Let me now call attention of the House to one provision of this bill, and let me ask whether officers of the Government who now have anything to do can possibly carry out the labors imposed upon them under this bill?

In section 2 it is provided that it shall be their duty in making such inspection to ascertain and report in detail as to the exact condition and needs of the Indians; what steps are necessary to be taken on behalf of the Government to improve their situation in the direction of their self-support and complete civilization; what, if any, of the reservations may be reduced in area, and what portion thereof, not needed for Indian occupation, may be held by the Government in trust for the Indians having title thereto by law or treaty, and disposed of for their benefit; what, if any, Indians may, with their consent, be removed to other reservations, with a view to their concentration, and the sale, on their behalf and for their benefit, of their abandoned reservations; what, if any, lands reserved by executive orders for Indian occupation are no longer needed for such purpose and may be restored to the public domain; what Indian lands now held in common should be allotted in severalty, the quantity to be allotted to heads of families, unmarried adults, orphans, or others, and what, if any, Indians are not provided with or located upon reservations or lands which may be patented to them; what is the exact number of Indians belonging to each tribe or band, the extent to which they are civilized and engaged in industrial pursuits, and what occupation is best suited to their circumstances and surroundings; whether they should be furnished with implements of agriculture or stock, and of what kind; in what cases and to what extent the support of the Government should be withdrawn; in what manner the annuities or other funds appropriated or payable by the United States to the Indians under existing treaties and laws should be expended to insure the greatest and most permanent benefit to them; wherein and in what manner the present plans of procuring and distributing Indian supplies should be changed; the conduct and fitness of the several Indian agents and agency employés; the number, kind, and qualification of employés required for the proper conduct of the service at each agency and on each reservation; where schools should be established or discontinued; the relative efficiency of the Indian reservation schools as compared with those Indian training schools not on reservations; the best plans and methods for accomplishing the educational and industrial training of the Indian youth and to make such training effective for their self-support; in what manner and to what extent the Indians upon the reservations can be placed under the protection of our laws and subjected to their penalties, and which, if any, Indians should be invested with the rights of citizenship; the extent to which the Indian reservations are occupied or intruded upon by unauthorized persons, and the best methods for correcting this evil, and to prevent the introduction upon Indian reservations or the sale to Indians of intoxicating liquors, and of arms and ammunition to such tribes or bands whose facilities for procuring such things should be further restricted.

Now, these multifarious and complicated duties can not be performed by anybody who has anything to do now.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Every line is a grant of power.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Secretary of the Interior is compelled to remain in his office from 10 in the morning till 4 in the afternoon. What time has he to spare for the discharge of these important duties? What time has any officer in that Department to devote to the distribution of lands in severalty among these Indians? How can they know how many Indians are upon a reservation unless they go there and count them?

Mr. COWLES. Does not the bill provide for the appointment of a portion only of the commission from the civil service of the Government, the Department of the Interior, and of those now holding office?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWLES. And a portion from the military arm of the Government?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; and that is what I am opposing.

Mr. COWLES. The gentleman can submit an amendment to strike out that part of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If we are to have a commission, let us appoint persons who will have time to discharge the duties imposed upon them; for I undertake to say that the commission appointed under this bill, if they fully execute its provisions, will have more business to do than any officer of the Government could attend to in addition to those which he is now called upon to discharge under the law.

This commission must go in person to each Indian reservation in order to treat with the various tribes. You can not bring the Indians to Washington for this purpose; you must go on the various reservations and count them and learn their qualifications for particular pursuits; you must learn what lands of their own can be allotted in severalty, and how many of the heads of the Indian families are willing to take their lands in severalty. These are questions which necessarily require the presence of the commission at every Indian reservation and among every tribe throughout the broad expanse of this country. You can not otherwise deal with the question.

Mr. COWLES. Does the gentleman propose this to be a resident commission?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; but I propose that it shall be a commission which can in the very nature of things discharge the duties for which it is created, and those duties will require them, instead of being a resident commission, to travel and acquaint themselves with the condition of each of the various Indian tribes on the reservations and deal with them individually and separately; and any other system of dealing with them will prove absolutely ineffectual.

Mr. COWLES. Is not the only use, or very nearly the only use—and I thank Providence for it—of the Army officers to locate them upon the frontier where the very nature of their duties is such as to familiarize them with the condition of the Indians and their wants?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am entirely willing, as I have already stated, to have some Army officers, if deemed proper, detailed for the service. I do not want this commission to be an extravagant one, but I want it to be able to accomplish the objects for which it is created; and if the presence of Army officers will be beneficial in that direction, and they can be spared from their duties in connection with the Army, I think it would be well to select some for that purpose.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, if it would be in order to offer an amendment at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). The Chair is informed that two amendments are pending, and an amendment now could only be offered and read for information in the time of the gentleman from Kansas. It can be read, to be considered at the proper time.

Mr. PETERS. Then I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 5, the word "three" and inserting "two;" and also, in lines 8 and 9, by striking out the words "or detailed from officers in the service of the Department of the Interior."

Mr. PETERS. I think, Mr. Speaker, that Army officers are not usually conversant with the character of administrative affairs that will be necessary to carry out the provisions of this bill, its object, its spirit, and its intent. Army officers are not, as a rule, experienced in the administration of subjects connected with civil affairs. Their duties as Army officers, their lives, and their training preclude the idea of their being fully conversant with civil affairs and civil government.

One of the objects of this bill, as I understand it, is to obtain information upon which legislation may be based in the future, and that information is of such a character that it will require the services of those who are familiar not only with Indian affairs and with the management of the Indians, as well as the policy pursued by the Government in relation to them during the past year, but also familiar with all matters and things connected with the public domain, with Indian treaties, as well as with the rights of the Indians under these various treaties. Now, I think it will not be contended that an Army officer who has been educated at West Point and has performed nothing but military duty for years and years can be supposed to be familiar with Indian treaties, with the management of Indians, and the policy of the Government in connection therewith during the past year. Aside from this, I think it is bad policy to provide that three of this commission shall be appointed from the Army, because all of us who are conversant with the social features connected with Army life and with Army officers know that these three officers would in almost every instance meet together in their views and ideas and stand together, and they would then have an even division of the commission upon any question that might come up. I therefore think it would be essential that the Army officers to be represented upon the commission should be in the minority.

I think, then, in relation to those selected from the Interior Department, that the amendment should prevail. I do not believe such a provision as is so contemplated would be wise. I think it requires something more than a mere knowledge of the clerical routine necessary in the management of the Interior Department to treat intelligently the subject-matter involved here. The man who is familiar with the books and ledgers and methods of keeping the accounts of the Indian Department is not the man who has ordinarily the breadth of view and knowledge of Indian affairs sufficient to treat intelligently with the questions presented to this commission by this bill. I believe that four of the members of the commission should be drawn from civil life, should be drawn from those who are conversant with the Indian treaties, should be taken from those who are conversant with Indian affairs, should be taken from those who have a knowledge of the relations the Indians sustain to our public domain; and I think, therefore, my amendment in relation to this provision of the bill should be adopted.

Mr. BAKER. In connection with the work to be done by this commission it is important for us to consider that they have, as has been stated by the gentleman from Iowa, very large powers conferred upon them. In the first place I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that they are invested with these powers and charged with the duties assigned to them entirely under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. By section 2 they are charged with investigating and reporting upon fifteen different subjects relating to the Indian question. These will necessarily require the judgment and experience of men of far more than ordinary ability.

It seems to me the proposition of the first section to constitute this commission by detailing three from the Army and three from the Department of the Interior, or to be appointed from civil life, is well calculated to meet the necessities of this important trust. The fifteen subjects with which they will be charged, and which they will be called upon to investigate, are very important. Attention has been called to one by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], but there are other questions of equal importance here specified.

At the very outset we find that their first duty is "to inspect, ascertain, and report as to the condition and needs of the Indians."

Secondly, they are to ascertain and report—

What steps are necessary to be taken on behalf of the Government to improve their circumstances in the direction of their self-support and complete civilization.

With those questions met, the progress of the Indians in the direction of their civilization and self-support is assured, and the Indian problem is practically solved.

The duty of the commission is also to investigate and to report as to—

What if any of the reservations may be reduced in area.

Now it must be remembered that we have in existence in the Indian Territory five civilized tribes, embracing a population of 65,000 persons, whose interests are secured by express treaty stipulations under laws of Congress. This bill contemplates that their rights and interests shall be protected, and provides that no action shall be taken and no recommendation made by this commission which shall have any effect until it is ratified by Congress. In that respect the bill is well guarded, and I think commends itself to every person who would deal justly by the Indian problem, and who would accord full protection to the rights of the Government of the United States as regards the public domain.

In the third section the commissioners are charged with certain duties. They are charged with the duty of negotiating with the Indians with a view to the adoption of certain plans for the betterment of their condition. These are important duties, and I think should be confided only to men of the very highest and best ability.

Mr. ROGERS. The remarks just delivered almost supersede the necessity for what I was about to say. This bill is a departure from the past and the present Indian policy. If it has any merit, it is in the fact that it is a departure; for nothing has fallen so far short of dealing with any public question as the policy heretofore with reference to the Indians.

I differ widely both with my friend from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] and my friend from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES]. The observations of the first proceed upon the theory that in the Interior Department exists a supernumerary corps of clerks who are capable of discharging the important duties of this commission. If that be true, my friend should commend the fact to the Civil Service Committee of the House and have these parties gotten rid of.

But if the departure in the Indian policy contemplated by this bill is to be successfully carried into execution, it ought not to be put under the control of those men who have been schooled and drilled in the narrow channels of the past precedents and practices which have hitherto governed the Department of the Interior in dealing with this broad and important question. In other words, whoever may be selected to serve upon this commission ought to be free from all these precedents and practices. They ought to be men of broad, general, and comprehensive views and with the courage of conviction to carry out such policies as may be found necessary in dealing practically with the Indian question. Then upon the other hand if we were to look this country over in all of its sections perhaps we would not find any class of men more capable of discharging the important duties connected with a commission like this than are numbers of the Army officers in this country.

There is scarcely one of these men of any importance in rank who has had any considerable length of service who has not been brought in contact with almost every Indian reservation throughout this broad land. Among that number will be found many of the best-advised and the best-informed men, and not only that, but men of the highest character and of the highest moral courage, administrative capacity, and executive ability. So that this commission when formed will come from both branches of the service; the one schooled in practical affairs in dealing with the Indians, and the other coming from the great civil ranks of life, where may be found the men best qualified to deal, in conjunction with the Army officers, with this important matter.

Therefore I say I agree fully with the committee which reported this bill upon that aspect of it, and acquiesce fully in the observations just delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. CUTCHEON. When this bill was before under consideration I offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the first section. It affects only the organization of the commission, and leaves its duties precisely as they are here. It adds to those duties certain duties belonging at the present time to the board of Indian commissioners. As is well known to every member of the House, we have now, and have had since 1869, a board of Indian commissioners, consisting of ten.

The duties of the board of Indian commissioners were first defined by an executive order of President Grant, under date of June 3, 1869. At that time they were almost as comprehensive as the duties which are imposed upon the proposed commission by this bill; but the duties of the board, as defined at the present time, will be found in the appropriation bill for the Indian service for the year 1883, and are as follows:

And hereafter the commission shall only have power to visit and inspect agencies and other branches of the Indian service and to inspect goods purchased for said service; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall consult with the commissioners on the purchase of supplies. The commission shall report their doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

In accordance with this law, the board of Indian commissioners have made their annual reports, two of which I now hold in my hand, two reports for the years 1883 and 1884. Now it seems to me wholly unnecessary to have both these boards of Indian commissioners. The existing board is not a paid body. It is composed of eminent gentlemen, who give their services, their expenses being paid by the Government. I have, therefore, by the substitute or amendment that has been read from the desk, proposed to annex the present duties of the existing board, inspecting agencies and inspecting and reporting upon supplies, to the duties enumerated by the pending bill.

As to the organization of the commission, as proposed in my substitute it differs from that proposed by the committee only in this: Foreseeing that a commission composed of any even number might find themselves in the same condition that our supreme court in the State of Michigan sometimes finds itself, evenly divided, I have provided for an odd number, whether it be five or seven I do not care; I have not used the word "shall," or made it mandatory upon the President to appoint any particular number of the members of the commission from civil life or from the Army. I do not care whether he takes two or three of them from the Army, but I am quite satisfied that they ought to be a minority of the commission. I think the majority ought to be from civil life. I am very positive about that.

I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] that this bill is a new departure of a most important character. It covers the entire Indian question in regard to tribal relations, in regard to education, in regard to lands in severalty—every important question which enters into what we call the Indian problem is here included and placed in the hands of these commissioners, making them, not omnipotent, but exceedingly potential in dealing with all these matters.

Mr. CANNON was recognized and yielded to Mr. CUTCHEON.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I thank the gentleman. A few words, and I shall have done. There is no need of both these boards. Either we should extend the powers of the existing commission or else wipe them out.

My substitute proposes to consolidate the powers of these two boards, to wipe out, if you please, the powers of the present commissioners, and to add their present limited jurisdiction to the broader jurisdiction proposed to be conferred by the pending bill. I trust that something like this will be done. We have had enough crossing of lines on this Indian question; we should have no more of it. Let us consolidate these powers. Let us make one commission, composed of eminent men, in part of men from the Army who have been brought in practical contact with the Indian tribes and understand Indian character, and in part of men from civil life who are able to comprehend the law and the treaties and the general bearings of the Indian question. I think that a part of the commission, also, but a small part, ought to come from the Interior Department, because there are men there whose familiarity with these questions for long years would enable them to understand more readily than others the scope and the relations of the different subjects involved.

Such a commission would meet the exigencies of the case, but I trust that we shall not have a commission composed of an even number of members, nor a commission the majority of whose members shall be taken from the Army. Let us have a commission composed of an odd number, with more than one-half of its members taken from civil life, and let us consolidate in its hands all these powers. Then we shall have unity and uniformity of action, no clashing, no collision, and we shall doubtless secure satisfactory results.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Do you not think that an experienced clerk from the Interior Department would be all that the commission would need from that quarter?

Mr. CUTCHEON. It has occurred to me that one of the heads of divisions, a man familiar with these Indian questions, should be taken. I think there should be at least one member of the commission from the Interior Department, and some from the Army, but the body of the commission should be composed of eminent citizens taken from civil life.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, I regard this bill as one of the most important bills that is now before Congress, and I hope it will pass; but on account of its importance I think we can not be too careful in guarding all its provisions and making it such a law as will probably give satisfaction to the country in shaping and determining the Indian policy of the government. I differ with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in regard to the necessity of any portion of this commission coming from the Interior Department. He says that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior might well be a member of the commission. Now the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior would have to pass upon the work of the commission.

Whatever practical measures the commission proposed would go into the hands of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior and would be passed upon by them, meeting either their approval or their disapproval. Again, so far as those two officers are concerned, they have the opportunity now, and it is their duty, to look into these matters, and doubtless the Commissioner on many occasions may visit the reservations and the country of the Indians, and can do so without the necessity of being a member of this commission.

I do not think that any clerk or head of a bureau or any other officer in the Interior Department should be a member of this commission. I believe it is wisely proposed to make this a mixed commission of officers of the Army and of gentlemen from civil life; but if in forming this commission you are to discard one or the other of these classes, it would be in my judgment far wiser to discard the gentlemen from civil life than to dispense with officers of the Army. One gentleman who has spoken discredits the executive ability and fitness of officers of the Army for the duties of this commission. I think no greater error could be committed. We have in the Army officers who, throughout long lives, have been in constant contact with the Indians, and are eminently suited to conduct negotiations with them.

Apart from their experience, derived from their long contact with Indian affairs, there is another reason which, in my judgment, makes them more suitable for the duties of this commission than gentlemen from civil life, although I believe a portion of this commission should be appointed from civil life. The fact is notorious throughout the whole extent of our Indian border that the Indians have confidence in the officers of the Army and have very little confidence in men from civil life who have been sent to negotiate or work with them. That has been the general experience in this country. And there is good reason for the feeling of the Indians in this matter. They have found that the officers of the Army have dealt with them fairly and squarely on all occasions, while they have been too often plundered by men from civil life who have been sent to transact business with them.

The point made by the gentleman last on the floor that a preponderance of the members of this commission should be from civil life, and that there should be an odd number of members, is not, I think, well taken. The finding of this commission is not to have any binding force, but is simply to be reported to Congress and passed upon by it. If there should be six members of this commission, and they should be equally divided in opinion, Congress, when it came to consider the report, could determine which was right and which was wrong.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. My friend will allow me to interrupt him to call his attention to the proviso of the third section—

That no such arrangement thus made which involves the change of any existing treaty or law shall be binding or operative until ratified by Congress.

It thus appears that everything else can be done by this commission without ratification by Congress. That is one of the extraordinary and dangerous powers conferred by the bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I do not understand that any recommendation which this commission might make would become law unless approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But it need not be approved by Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROGERS obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON].

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend from Texas will observe the language of the third section:

All such arrangements as may be thus made and agreed upon to be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, who may, in his discretion, approve them in whole or in part: Provided, That no such arrangement thus made which involves the change of any existing treaty or law shall be binding or operative until ratified by Congress.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That refers only to the "arrangements" to be made under the third section.

Mr. HOLMAN. It refers to all the powers of action confided to this commission, and those are all embraced in this section.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Under this bill, would not the Secretary of the Interior, on the recommendation of this commission, or even without it, be authorized to remove the Indians from reservations which they are now occupying under departmental order? If this commission should find the Indians ought to be removed from one place to another, the Secretary of the Interior can do it without reporting to Congress at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not that the law now? This bill confers no new power in that respect.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It is now the law; but it is not being exercised. Suppose, however, that this commission should go down to the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation and find there Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Kiowas, Comanches, and Kickapoos occupying a certain portion of that country——

Mr. HOLMAN. Under executive order.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Under executive order. May not this commission decide it to be a good thing that those Indians living west of the rain-belt should be removed——

Mr. HOLMAN. Farther east.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Farther east, onto the Oklahoma lands. Now, would not the Secretary of the Interior have the power to ratify such a recommendation and put those Indians there without Congress having anything to say about it?

Mr. HOLMAN. He has that power now.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But the Secretary of the Interior would not exercise the power now when a bill is pending before Congress to organize a Territorial government there. If, however, this commission should be appointed in the face of the fact that a bill is now pending to organize a Territorial government in Oklahoma, it is very likely something of that kind would take place. The bill would confer a very dangerous power in this respect.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no provision in this bill that increases the power of any officer. It provides for no increase of power. If there should be, as undoubtedly there will be all along the line, recommendations by this commission for changes in the terms of treaties and various matters of that kind, these recommendations will all have to be ratified by Congress.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. In reply to that I will say that now Congress would be very slow to act; would act with great discretion and deliberation; but if a change of policy should be indorsed by a report of a commission created under this act the case might be otherwise.

Mr. BAKER. Is it not true that the Secretary of the Interior now possesses every one of the powers proposed to be conferred on this commission by section 2 of this bill?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I do not think he does.

Mr. BAKER. I think he does.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will discuss that with the gentleman when we come to consider that section.

Mr. BAKER. The third section, as has already been suggested, provides that all arrangements which may be agreed upon by the commission shall be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, and they are subject to his approval, in whole or in part, as he may determine.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There are numerous provisions of section 2 which I desire to discuss when we come to consider that section.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I have no doubt my friend from Iowa will have ample time hereafter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that by unanimous consent the five minutes yielded to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] will be considered as beginning now.

The SPEAKER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that under the provisions of this bill no difficulty will arise by reason of any action which this commission may take, or any approval of such action by the Secretary of the Interior. I feel quite assured the Secretary would be entirely disposed to observe whatever may be foreshadowed here as the will of Congress in regard to Oklahoma or any other portion of the Indian Territory. But, sir, is it not the fact that this territory of Oklahoma was purchased from the Indians with the distinct understanding that it might be peopled by other friendly Indians?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly. But the Representatives from the States of Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, and Kansas, as the Commissioner of Indian Affairs states in his annual report, have unanimously and "fiercely" insisted that no more Indians shall be put into the Indian Territory from any place whatever.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The Representatives from Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, and Kansas have insisted that the Apaches and other distant tribes should not be brought to the Indian-Territory. But Oklahoma is a part of the Indian Territory. And if the cases submitted by my friend from Iowa are to be put in vogue for the removal of the Arapahoes and Cheyennes to Oklahoma it would be in accordance with the treaty made with these Indians.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The Apaches——

Mr. THROCKMORTON. My friend from Iowa knows I have only a few minutes, and I hope he will permit me to proceed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to reply. The gentleman does not stand here representing the people of Texas to insist the savages living southwest of Oklahoma, and who do not cultivate an acre of the soil, or, if any, but a few, that those who live beyond the rain-belt, those who do not cultivate the soil and do not want to, shall be taken from where they are and put upon the tillable portion of Oklahoma to the exclusion of white settlers. Does he stand here and insist they shall be put on the fertile lands of Oklahoma and that white people shall be driven beyond the rain-belt?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I stand here faithfully to carry out the stipulations made by the Government of the United States with the five civilized tribes of Indians. And in my judgment, sir, it is beneath the dignity of any member of Congress to do anything in the way of violating our treaty stipulations with those Indians.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is no treaty with the five civilized tribes of Indians requiring any such thing on our part.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. No, but the Government promised it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Is it a violation of the treaty when we do not put them there?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. When that question comes up we will argue it, whether it is or is not in violation of treaty stipulations.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is no violation of treaty stipulations.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. It was agreed to by treaty stipulations, and for that purpose and with that understanding the Indians consented to it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It was agreed to put freedmen there also.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Precisely; but the freedmen will not go there.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And the Indians refuse also to go there.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. That question can be fully discussed when the Oklahoma bill is before the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has been elicited during this brief discussion shows the vast importance of this bill, and the necessity of giving it the most careful consideration.

Let me recur to the appointment of Army officers as a part of this commission. Now, it is well known we have Army officers who have had large experience in regard to Indian matters, and who have been connected in such manner with all the subject-matters to be brought under investigation in such commission as will make them the very best of executive officers, and their judgment can be relied upon as surely as the judgment of any civilian in the country. I trust, therefore, instead of diminishing the number of Army officers to be appointed on this commission, if any change be made, the number will be increased in that direction.

But I believe three civilians and three Army officers will be sufficient for the purposes of the commission. I am in favor of composing the commission equally of civilians and Army officers, because I think it will strengthen its recommendations when they come to be presented to the country.

Instead of not being qualified for this peculiar work, as the gentleman from Kansas has intimated, I think they are qualified in an especial degree for its execution. We have found in our past experience officers educated at West Point make the very best executive officers. And if there is to be any change at all, although I hope there will be none, it should be in the direction of increasing the number of these Army officers. I hope no member of the Interior Department will be placed upon this commission.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, after the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] I do not feel it to be necessary for me to say much on this bill, because his views are sound upon that portion of it which he undertook to discuss. I, like him, believe there are to be found men in the military service of the country, serving upon the western frontiers, who are as well qualified and, in fact, better qualified than any other class of men we have in the public service amicably to adjust the Indian question.

There is another important reason for the appointment of this commission, and that is this: It is a well known fact to all who have given this subject careful attention that there are scarcely to be found two tribes of Indians that are alike. There are scarcely any two of them who are located alike. Their surroundings, their manner of living, and they are dissimilar in almost every respect.

This commission being a supervisory board and auxiliary to the Indian service, and intrusted with the execution of this law, will go and investigate each and every tribe of Indians and every trouble in regard to lands and everything else pertaining to them. They will make it their exclusive business to do nothing else than the duty imposed upon them by this bill. The facts they will accumulate will be submitted to Congress by the Secretary, and will be in every way reliable and complete.

The great trouble about the Indian agents is that each one has his own little government about him, and his reports apply solely to this particular community. This commission, if the bill becomes a law, grasps the whole Indian question. Those persons upon it who are detailed from civil life are presumed to be men of practical experience and capacity, men who know something about the Indian question, who will act in conjunction with men who have spent half a lifetime upon the frontier and are thoroughly conversant with the Indian problem. When these men act in conjunction, and go from reservation to reservation, examining the condition of the Indians and the treaties with the various tribes, investigate their needs, wants, and capacity, their ability for improvement, grasp the whole thing and report the results back to the Interior Department, it will prove a source of information to Congress as reliable as any that can possibly be obtained.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will now consent to limit debate to some reasonable time. How much time does the gentleman from Iowa desire?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we can not now very safely limit debate upon the bill. When we reach the second section, that is the section in which the main grant of power is contained, it is very voluminous, very extensive, and will require, every line of it, careful consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman to propose to limit the debate upon the pending section and amendments.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask the previous question upon the first section of the bills and amendments.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if that would include the amendments offered by myself and read for information?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to including all the amendments which have been sent to the desk to be read for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. With that understanding the gentleman from Indiana demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in section 1, lines 7 and 8, the words "appointed from civil life or."

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

To come in after the word "Interior," in line 9 of section 1:

"Provided, That members of Congress may be appointed to the places to be filled by civilians; and that those who may be appointed on this commission, and who are in receipt of salaries from the Government, shall receive no additional compensation; but their traveling and other expenses shall be paid on sworn vouchers."

Mr. REAGAN. I understand from conversation with several gentlemen that it will not be practicable for members of Congress to attend to the duties of this commission during this summer, and I therefore, if there be no objection, withdraw the amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 5, the word "three" and inserting "two." Also amend by striking out, in lines 8 and 9, the words "or detailed from officers in the service of the Department of the Interior."

Mr. PETERS. I would like to suggest by unanimous consent to the gentleman from Indiana that the word "major" be stricken out and the word "captain" inserted instead in this section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent, as the gentleman makes the suggestion, that the word "major" be stricken out and "captain" inserted. Many gentlemen of that grade are eminently qualified to fill the duties of this position.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to ask whether or not the amendment now pending is divisible?

The SPEAKER. There are two propositions involved in the amendment; in fact there are two amendments to the section.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I ask a separate vote upon them.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken upon the first branch of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 5, the word "three" and insert "two."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 18, noes 29.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. PETERS was read, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 8 and 9, the words "or detailed from officers in the service of the Department of the Interior."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 41, noes 37.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the substitute for the first section, proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask unanimous consent to modify the substitute by changing the number of the commission from seven to five.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The substitute was read, as follows:

1. Amend the title of the bill to read as follows:

"A bill to provide for reorganizing and further defining the duties of the board of Indian commissioners, and for other purposes."

2. Amend section 1 of said bill so that it shall read as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to reorganize the board of Indian commissioners, so as to make it to consist of five persons, two of whom may be detailed from the officers of the Army, who shall report to the Secretary of the Interior for duty, the other members to be appointed from the existing board, from civil life, or detailed from officers in the service of the Department of the Interior. And when said board of Indian commissioners shall be so appointed, the organization and functions of the present board of Indian commissioners shall cease and determine. It shall be the duty of the said reorganized board of Indian commissioners to perform all duties heretofore intrusted to and performed by the board of Indian commissioners; and they shall inspect all goods and supplies purchased for the Indian service, and advise the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to the purchase of such goods and supplies. It shall also be the duty of said commissioners, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to inspect from time to time, as he may require, the condition of the Indians of the various tribes and bands on the different reservations under the care, control, or jurisdiction of the United States."

Mr. CUTCHEON. The latter portion is precisely in the words of the latter part of the first section of the bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask if we can not have a division upon this amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to strike out and insert, which is not divisible.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I would like to support the first part of it, which does away with the present commission and attaches the duties to the new commission.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken upon the substitute as a whole.

The substitute was rejected.

The Clerk read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be their duty in making such inspection to ascertain and report in detail as to the exact condition and needs of the Indians; what steps are necessary to be taken on behalf of the Government to improve their situation in the direction of their self-support and complete civilization; what, if any, of the reservations may be reduced in area, and what portion thereof, not needed for Indian occupation, may be held by the Government in trust for the Indians having title thereto by law or treaty, and disposed of for their benefit; what, if any, Indians may, with their consent, be removed to other reservations, with a view to their concentration, and the sale, on their behalf and for their benefit, of their abandoned reservations; what, if any, lands reserved by executive orders for Indian occupation are no longer needed for such purpose and may be restored to the public domain; what Indian lands now held in common should be allotted in severalty, the quantity to be allotted to heads of families, unmarried adults, orphans, or others, and what, if any, Indians are not provided with or located upon reservations or lands which may be patented to them; what is the exact number of Indians belonging to each tribe or band, the extent to which they are civilized and engaged in industrial pursuits, and what occupation is best suited to their circumstances and surroundings; whether they should be furnished with implements of agriculture or stock, and of what kind; in what cases and to what extent the support of the Government should be withdrawn; in what manner the annuities or other funds appropriated or payable by the United States to the Indians under existing treaties and laws should be expended to insure the greatest and most permanent benefit to them; wherein and in what manner the present plans of procuring and distributing Indian supplies should be changed; the conduct and fitness of the several Indian agents and agency employés; the number, kind, and qualification of employés required for the proper conduct of the service at each agency and on each reservation; where schools should be established or discontinued; the relative efficiency of the Indian reservation schools as compared with those Indian training schools not on reservations; the best plans and methods for accomplishing the educational and industrial training of the Indian youth, and to make such training effective for their self-support; in what manner and to what extent the Indians upon the reservations can be placed under the protection of our laws and subjected to their penalties, and which, if any, Indians should be invested with the rights of citizenship; the extent to which the Indian reservations are occupied or intruded upon by unauthorized persons, and the best methods for correcting this evil, and to prevent the introduction upon Indian reservations, or the sale to Indians, of intoxicating liquors, and of arms and ammunition to such tribes or bands whose facilities for procuring such things should be further restricted.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I move to strike out the second section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that there are several amendments pending to that section which must be voted on first, and then a motion to strike out the section will be in order.

The Clerk read the following amendment to the second section, proposed by Mr. DORSEY:

After the word "self-support," in line 41, add the following:

"Also to ascertain the amounts due from the Government to the different tribes of Indians for educational purposes already agreed upon, or promised to be paid by treaties heretofore made."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following amendment, proposed by Mr. GALLINGER:

Add to section 2 the following words:

"Provided, That no person shall be appointed a member of the commission who habitually uses as a beverage any spirituous or intoxicating liquors."

The amendment was disagreed to; there being—ayes 26, noes 37.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6429) granting a pension to Eunice E. Clark.

INDIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to offer an amendment to the second section, to come after the amendment last adopted.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Also to ascertain what property, and the value thereof, of settlers has been destroyed by the Indians, and the tribe to which the Indians belonged who destroyed said property.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to say that there are certain claims pending before this House in the nature of bills for property destroyed by Indian tribes or by members of certain Indian tribes; and it seems to me if this commission is to be appointed to investigate the number of subjects that are enumerated in this second section, they would have ample and good opportunity to investigate as to the property destroyed and the value of the property destroyed by these tribes, and to ascertain also the Indians and the tribes to which they belonged that destroyed the property.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will not press that amendment. The subject of his amendment is entirely different from the general purpose of the bill. The investigation of the depredations by Indians should be assigned to a separate commission. The questions are judicial. It seems to me the duties devolved upon the commission proposed by this bill are of so high and important a character as expressed in the bill that these duties of detail, involving also judicial powers, should not be conferred on this commission.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has sent a communication to Congress giving a list of those claims. They number forty-five hundred, and embrace sums aggregating $15,000,000. They cover the whole period of our existence under the Constitution of the United States. If this commission is to be authorized to take those subjects under consideration it can give no attention to the Indians as provided in the other portions of this bill.

Mr. PETERS. In reply to the statement just made let me say that I think the examination of this subject by this Indian commission would tend to give them a more practical knowledge of Indian affairs and the relations of the Indians to the white settlers and to our country than any other investigation they could undertake. I think it would be a species of education that this commission, appointed as contemplated, very much needs.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, I will say to my friend from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] this is a matter far too large for this commission to undertake. I would like to go with him or with any one else to have these claims investigated. Two bills are now pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I can only express my regret that they have not given their attention to this matter and made a report to the House. One of these bills refers the claims to the Court of Claims and the other authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to appoint a commission within the Department who shall examine and finally determine, approve, or reject these claims and report to Congress for an appropriation.

While we have this subject up, I beg the attention of the House to the question introduced by my friend from Kansas. It is a crying shame that the Congress has sat here from year to year since 1847 and has neglected these claims secured by treaty stipulations between the Government and the Indians. But my friend can not attain his object under this bill. If he will join with me and encourage the Committee on Indian Affairs to report one or the other of the propositions to which I have referred, I trust before this Congress adjourns these long-suffering people who have been despoiled of their property will have a response from the heart of the American Congress in their behalf.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to add one word. The document I referred to is Executive Document No. 125, first session Forty-ninth Congress, and is a letter of the Secretary of the Interior to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, transmitting the report of Commissioner Atkins on the subject of Indian depredations. In that document gentlemen will find the statement made that there are forty-five hundred of these claims, approximating in amount to $15,000,000. I call the attention of the House to this important document, because it is a subject we should deal with in legislation to come up hereafter.

Mr. PEEL. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that we have had the measure which has been referred to under consideration, and I think I can say with safety it will be reported at a very early day. We have had so much work before us that we can not possibly dispose of it all. But at a very early day we will be able to report a measure that will supersede the necessity of this amendment. The proposition is one that will be judicial in its character and in keeping with the object sought. As this amendment is foreign to the object of this bill I hope the gentleman will not insist upon it now.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, the explanation just made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], if we had some assurance that the bill would pass, would do away with the necessity for the amendment proposed by my friend from Kansas [Mr. PETERS]. Sir, if there is a subject upon which the lawmakers of this country have been remiss in their duty during the last quarter of a century, it is the payment of claims for depredations upon the pioneers of the West by the murders and ravages of the Indians. When we come here and present the facts that people have been murdered and that their property has been destroyed by roving bands of Indians, we are met by the proposition that a few Indians have been killed. Sir, that is no answer. The Government of the United States should keep the peace and should protect the white man as well as the Indian.

Sir, about thirteen months ago, hearing that in Southwestern Colorado the Indians were getting leave from the agent of the Southern Ute agency to go and hunt off their reservation because they had not rations to support them, and that they were ranging through the country where the cowboys were proceeding to make their "round-up," I foresaw there would be trouble. Every now and then they were killing cattle without any justification whatever, and the cowboys said they were stealing their horses. Having had some experience in the West, I knew what must inevitably be the result if action was not taken to protect the innocent settlers from the Indians. I therefore asked that a summer camp should be established in Southeastern Utah or Southwestern Colorado, and that two companies should be sent from Fort Lewis to establish the camp and protect the pioneers along the little streams where they had gone to bring out their irrigating ditches and settle and make homes.

Action was slow, and it was easy to anticipate what would take place and what in a short time did take place. In two weeks from the time I wrote that communication to the President expressing my apprehension that there would be a conflict between the cowboys and the Indians, and that the Indians, after losing two or three of their vagabond scoundrels who had been stealing horses and killing cattle, not having the courage to go out and take revenge upon the cowboys, would go along these little streams where the pioneers had settled on the arable land (made arable by their irrigating ditches) and would murder them—sir, in two weeks from the time I wrote that communication to the executive department a little row took place between the Indians and cowboys, the cowboys claiming that the Indians had stolen some horses and the Indians claiming that the horses belonged to them, and the usual fight ensued, in which three or four Indians were killed.

The very next night a band of Indians went to the Dolores and to the cabin of a poor man who was trying to make a home there. They set fire to the cabin; he ran out in the light and blaze of the fire; they shot him. His wife ran out to try to protect him, and she was pierced through the shoulder by a bullet from a gun of one of the savages. Then she ran into the cabin, dragged her little children out of the back door and into the sage brush, and thence into the darkness of the thicket, and made her way to where she was taken care of by the neighbors. She was brought to Durango, a subscription was taken up, and she has subsisted mostly on charity from that time to this. She has partially recovered, though her arm will be useless the balance of her days. Her little children have been living on the charity of her neighbors in Durango.

I went to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs this very morning, and I said to him: "Is not this an extraordinary case? Can you not make this case special? Can you not have it examined ahead of the few thousands of claims that are now on file in the Department?" The Commissioner said that under the law and the rule he did not know how he could do so, but that if I would make an application to him he would try to have the Secretary of the Interior make the case special. Meanwhile that woman and her children are starving. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] ought to be adopted.

If we are going to create an expensive commission to deal with the Indians and try thereby to improve the administration of Indian affairs, these commissioners should investigate and report on such depredation claims.

The claims are very just, and the present mode of dealing with them amounts to a denial of all justice to these suffering claimants. We are paying millions of money to these Indians to keep them in idleness, and we are practically refusing to pay these just demands.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the previous question on the pending section and the amendment.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I hope that will not be done. I have been yielding here by courtesy to give several gentlemen an opportunity to express themselves, but I want to make a speech myself.

Mr. PRICE was recognized.

Mr. HOLMAN. After the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] is heard I shall call for the previous question.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, there is a phase of this question which I think has not been brought out, and which I desire very briefly to bring to the attention of the House; that is the question of the propriety of creating such a commission as this at all. In the first place, I have very grave doubt of our power to create a commission that will do the work here proposed, and do it for what it is worth.

In support of this suspicion, I desire to call attention to a recent report made by a select committee sent out by the Forty-eighth Congress on this identical business. That commission is held up to us as a model of economy. I have not an itemized account of its expenses; but I find that $4,500 was expended by four gentlemen—excellent gentlemen, too. I find that they took with them the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House. Was he taken along to keep the Indians off? [Laughter.] They took with them also the clerk of one of the committees of this House; and they hired a stenographer. How many of these gentlemen took their wives with them I do not know. But is not the report of the expenses of this committee enough to emphasize the fact that it is very difficult to get this kind of work done, even under the economical management of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, for what it is properly worth? Something appears to stick to it that ought not to belong to it.

Now with relation to this subject of commissions, I want to call attention to the fact that for fifteen or twenty years past the people of this country, in numbers counting thousands where there are hundreds of these Indians, have been asking Congress to appoint a commission to inquire what effect the alcoholic liquor traffic has upon the revenues of the Government, upon our civilization, upon our political system. For at least a decade and a half the petitioners for such a commission have been spurned from the councils of this nation and their request denied. Here are two hundred and sixty thousand Indians, not distinguished for their beauty [laughter], neither ornamental nor useful; and the great American heart goes gushing out toward them. Yet in every three years of our nation's history a greater number of those people of this country, that embrace all its respectability and intelligence and produce all its wealth, go down under the blasting influence of a crime sanctioned by this Congress; and when we come here seeking information on this subject through the establishment of a commission you turn a deaf ear. Is there any consistency in this? Or is there not a "gush," with a lack of sense and correct sentiment behind it, which can not commend itself to the minds of candid men?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I trust that my motion to strike out this second section will be adopted. I think this is a most extraordinary section. Indeed, the bill itself is extraordinary and in my judgment entirely unnecessary. The second section begins by providing—

That it shall be their duty—

That is, the duty of the commissioners—

in making such inspection to ascertain and report in detail as to the exact condition and needs of the Indians.

Now, we already have an Indian Commissioner; we already have an Indian agent for every tribe; we have special agents; we have Indian inspectors; and it does seem to me that all the avenues of information are now open, all the necessary machinery is already provided, all the required officers are already appointed, for ascertaining the condition of every Indian tribe on this continent. I submit, therefore, that this measure is entirely useless and unnecessary—not in the line of retrenchment and reform.

Let me call attention to other provisions of this section. The commission is to inquire—

What, if any, Indians may, with their consent, be removed to other reservations.

Now, when I said that under the provisions of this bill "blanket Indians" living west of the rain-belt might be removed east onto the fertile lands of Oklahoma, which had not been occupied by the Indians for twenty years, and ought to be reserved for white settlers, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] said, as I understood, that it was beneath the dignity of a member of this House to insist that that should not take place. Why, sir, it is of record, as we are informed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that the objection to the removal of any more Indians to the Indian Territory came from the Representatives of the States of Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, and Kansas. When the Government had a perfect right under the treaties with the Seminoles, the Creeks, the Cherokees, and other Indians to remove Indians not residing in the Indian Territory to that Territory, an objection which the Commissioner of Indian Affairs pronounced to have been "fierce"—and I say rightly so—came from the Representatives of those States against such action by the Interior Department.

Mr. RYAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that there is an act of Congress prohibiting the removal of any Indians from Arizona.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is an act of Congress forbidding the removal of Apaches and Sioux Indians, and that is by a provision which was offered as an amendment to an appropriation bill by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. There is no general act of Congress prohibiting the removal of other Indians.

Now, if they could prohibit the removal of those Indians in the line of the treaty and in the line of the law, there is nothing to prevent members of Congress providing that the blanket Indians shall be removed west of the rain-belt, because those Indians do not cultivate a particle of the soil, as they have no more use for it than a wolf. They do not live upon the products of the soil, but upon the products of the chase, with what they can get from United States appropriations.

Mr. RYAN. That is, what they can get from the Commissary Department.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Generally out of appropriations in the Indian appropriation bill. They live on the products of the chase and what they can get from those Indian appropriations, instead of upon the products of the soil.

Under the provisions of this bill, Mr. Speaker, there is an attempt in my judgment to seek fresh authority and expression from Congress to commit the Government to a policy of removing these Indians from one reservation in the Indian Territory to another. And that is what we protest against.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STRUBLE. What is the pending question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the question discussed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] is hardly a question germane, I take it, to the bill we have under debate. And the great difficulty I have in dealing with my friend from Iowa in any discussion with him is to get him to stick to the facts. Now, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has not said anything about the Representatives from Arkansas.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Hand me his published report, and I will show it to you.

Mr. ROGERS. No; but I want to show you, as I have the floor. I want to get you to stick to the facts, if I can. I invite your attention, therefore, to this extract from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

But a stronger and more potent objection to concentration in the Indian Territory exists than any yet given, and that is the fierce and uncompromising opposition which this proposition meets in the almost unanimous sentiment of the white citizens of the four great States of Missouri, Kansas, Texas, and Arkansas, which surround this Territory. Such an array of political power and influence, speaking as one man, is entitled to respect and grave consideration.

Now, sir, the first intimation——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I supposed they were all citizens of those States of which they are Representatives. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. That is an artful dodge. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But still you do not get around it.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman's statement was that it was the "Representatives of Arkansas." I presume he used the expression meaning Representatives on this floor, or those who preceded them. There is nothing important in it, but this misleading statement may do injury in other quarters.

Let me invite attention to another fact which has some significance and some importance. While the people surrounding the Indian Territory may resist the concentration there of tribes from other reservations, the natural result of which is to prolong the present status quo there and prevent them from becoming civilized by being separated from the white people, yet there is no opposition from any of those States that I have ever heard of or dreamed of from any quarter to the Government's concentrating those Indians now there anywhere it pleases in that Territory, provided such action looks to the speedy civilization of those Indians. In other words, responding to another suggestion the gentleman makes, let me say that the policy of the Government is to civilize them, to get them into agricultural districts, where they may be taught by example and precept the arts of agriculture.

But how shall we teach them agriculture, when my distinguished friend from Iowa proposes to remove them to the arid plains, where nothing but a prairie-hen could live?

The Government in negotiating for Oklahoma acquired it for a specific purpose, and that specific purpose was to settle these wild Indians in a country where they could make a living for themselves by agriculture. And when that specific purpose of the Government is marked out by treaty stipulations we have it contemplated here that that purpose shall not be carried out, but shall be superseded by a purpose the treaty never contemplated at all.

Now, I will go with the gentleman from Iowa, and with the very strongest desire possible, to see these people civilized and that country opened to settlement to become a State of this Union with every man within its borders clothed with all the rights and privileges of citizenship; but we should not undertake, Mr. Speaker, to do that by disregarding facts and violating all of the obligations of the treaties under which we are bound toward these people. There is a way and a method out of the difficulty without adopting such a course as that.

There is this feature, if we are going to open up the country to settlement in violation of the treaties we should do it by establishing a Territorial government at once, changing thereby the policy of the Government toward the treaties as heretofore made, regarding them as mere expedients for the civilization of the Indians as I have had occasion to say heretofore, and not by undertaking to violate little by little this or that treaty, never keeping faith with them in our dealings. Let it be done by a systematic policy, which operates equally upon all. Let the Territories be opened, if that is to be the policy, so that these men may in time be clothed with all the rights and duties of American citizenship.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I assented to the reporting of this bill, and as it has been amended I shall vote for it, although there are some amendments I would like to have added to it.

I do not think it is perfect in all its provisions, but it is a step forward, and I believe if in good faith the Executive appoints a competent commission, with the authority this bill confers upon them, that very valuable information can be made and report upon the same to the Secretary of the Interior and in turn to Congress for its action. I think the information thus furnished will be most valuable.

But what I desired to say upon it I indicated some weeks ago, when I addressed the House upon the subject, and have no desire to say it over again.

What I wish to see accomplished now as rapidly as possible, and I would run while the Government has been creeping heretofore at a snail's pace in that direction, is the reduction of these large reservations. The Indians should be taken off the large reservations and placed upon very small ones, or their lands assigned in severalty and intersettlement with the whites. All that stands in the way now of carrying out that policy, in my opinion, is the want of knowledge on the part of the Executive, knowledge on the part of Congress, knowledge on the part of the people.

I will stand by this commission by my vote, because I believe it is a means adjusted to the end. That it can be worked out in one month or one year I have no idea, but it is the commencement, and that is all I desire to say upon the merits.

One word in reply to the playful allusion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] touching the expenditures of the committee. Never was a committee appointed by Congress brought down to such a rigid system of economic expenditures as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] brought down this committee, as I think each member of it can bear witness, from being some hundreds of dollars out of pocket. I will say to my friend from Wisconsin that I do not think any money was spent from the Treasury, certainly none was spent upon anybody except the members of the committee, and even that very scantily. The most rigid economy was practiced. It would have been impossible, I imagine, to have gotten along for less. I do not know where the gentleman from Wisconsin journeyed last summer, or whether he took his wife with him or whether he paid her bills or not. That is none of my business as long as he did not pay for her bills out of the public Treasury. But certainly his expenditures could not show more economy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire now to call the previous question upon this section and amendments.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will not do that for a moment; I wish to reply to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I shall not occupy over two or three minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield three minutes.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Arkansas that he will never have any trouble in holding me to my text. I will hold myself to it if he will let me alone. But I want to call the attention of the House to the distinction the honorable gentleman makes. He says that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs does not say that the "Representatives" of the four great States of Missouri, Kansas, Texas, and Arkansas which surround the Territory are opposed to this concentration.

Mr. BLAND. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that, as one of the Representatives of one of the States mentioned, I am opposed to this concentrating of the Indians in that great Territory.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not object to that. I concur fully with my friend from Missouri on that point. I so said in my remarks.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I understand, then, the gentleman says it is not the Representatives of these States but the people of the States who object to this concentration. Well, in the first place, it was not to be supposed that the gentleman from Arkansas was not one of the people of the State which he represents.

Mr. ROGERS. I think my friend from Iowa, after the promise he has just made of sticking to the text, is going very far from it. The gentleman must be aware that I made a distinction between the concentration or removal of all of the tribes in this country into the Territory and the concentration of the tribes now in the Territory. I am distinctly opposed to removing any other wild Indians to the Territory, but I think those now there should be so located and disposed of as to promote their civilization, and I believe that would be done by concentrating them on smaller reservations than they now occupy.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Well, then, any more tribes. He is not in favor of concentrating all the tribes; and I want to know if he is in favor of concentrating any more of them.

Mr. ROGERS. I answer in the negative. But that is not the question.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman to take the position before the House that he is in favor of removing the Comanches, the Apaches, the Kiowas, the Kickapoos, and other Indians now in the Indian Territory to Oklahoma to the exclusion of the white settlers?

Mr. ROGERS. It is not necessary for me to answer that question. I do not claim to know just where it is best for them to be located. But I will say to the gentleman whatever will most speedily hasten their civilization in that regard I am in favor of; and the gentleman should not attempt to put me or my people in the attitude of opposing that. They want them civilized and the country opened as soon as possible.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But the gentleman did say he was in favor of putting these Indians where they would make a living and of teaching them agriculture; and that was equivalent to saying he was in favor of putting them in the Oklahoma Territory.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The previous question on the second section and amendments thereto is demanded by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS], which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 41, after the word "self-supporting," add the following:
"Also to ascertain what property, and the full value thereof, of settlers has been destroyed by the Indians, and the tribe to which the Indians belonged who destroyed said property."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 46.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], to strike out the second section.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be their duty to arrange with the various tribes and bands, in the manner and upon the terms most favorable and just alike to the Indians and to the United States, and to procure the consent of the Indians thereto, in accordance with the treaty, law, or customs governing the tribes or bands in such matters, for the cession or relinquishment of any portion of their reservations; for their removal to other reservations, and consolidation with other Indians thereon; for any changes in the manner of expending their annuities, and, generally, other matters calculated to promote their advancement and civilization. All such arrangements as may be thus made and agreed upon to be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, who may, in his discretion, approve them in whole or in part: Provided, That no such arrangement thus made which involves the change of any existing treaty or law shall be binding or operative until ratified by Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], which the Clerk will read.

Mr. RYAN. Before that amendment is read I desire to offer an amendment which should properly come in before that.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

In line 16, section 3, after the word "law," insert "or removal of any Indians to other reservations.

Mr. RYAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROGERS. May I interrupt the gentleman for one moment? I want to understand him. I did not catch sufficiently the amendment to understand it, and ask the Clerk to report the proviso as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no such arrangement thus made which involves the change of any existing treaty or law, or the removal of any Indians to other reservations, shall be binding or operative until ratified by Congress.

Mr. RYAN. This amendment will simply preserve the present practice of the Government. Although perhaps the Secretary of the Interior may have by present law authority to remove Indians from reservations, still the Department has done nothing of the kind, I think, for many years without express authority from Congress. It has been the practice whenever the Department desired to move Indians from one reservation to another to inform Congress of the desirability of doing so and the reasons therefor, and to ask Congress to make an appropriation for that purpose. But this bill would step in and seem to change that practice and specially authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make such removals without further action on the part of Congress.

I think the present practice the safer and the wiser one, and therefore I have introduced the amendment which would require the Secretary of the Interior first to get the assent of Congress for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] whether it would not be better to make the provision apply simply to the removal of Indians to the Indian Territory rather than make it apply to all. Under the present law the Secretary of the Interior can remove the Sioux Indians in the Northern portion of Dakota to the Sioux reservation, which my friend from Kansas, I think, believes ought to be done. The Blackfeet Indians can be removed with great benefit to themselves and the white population of that section of country to the Flathead reservation. Why not leave the discretion with the Secretary of the Interior except as to the removal of Indians to the Indian Territory?

Mr. RYAN. I am not sure that I quite understand my friend from Indiana. Does he want to confine this to removals to the Indian Territory alone? I ask him to suggest the modification he desires.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not myself in favor of the proviso, but if adopted I suggest this is the better form:

Or the removal of the Indians to the Indian Territory.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, the modification would simply abolish, so to speak, the practice of the Government for many years. While, perhaps, the power has existed to remove Indians from one reservation to another, except those in Arizona and New Mexico, to the Indian Territory, still the Department has not exercised that power. On the contrary, it has always, as I stated a little while ago, informed Congress of the desirability of their removal and the reasons therefor, and asked Congress to make an appropriation for that purpose. Now that is a wise practice, and I do not see why we should introduce legislation here to change it.

The amendment which I offer simply preserves the present practice. If it is desirable to remove Indians from any part of the country to the Indian Territory or from one point to another, it is but proper it seems to me to preserve the practice and custom of the Government by which the Department has hitherto appealed to Congress for approval and for funds for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is certainly aware there has been some consolidation of the Chippewas within the last two years, and that we have already legislated this session on the Indian appropriation bill with a view to a further concentration of the Chippewa Indians.

Mr. RYAN. I do not care whether the authority of Congress appears in an appropriation bill or elsewhere, but the practice has been to obtain the approval of Congress before any removals whatever have been made.

Mr. HOLMAN. An appropriation of money for the removal would have to be made at any rate, so I think there is not much danger.

Mr. RYAN. Then, sir, my amendment is highly proper. If it becomes necessary under the bill that an appropriation shall be made before any action can be had, then, of course, it becomes necessary for Congress to act before there can be a removal. My amendment is simply in the line of the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana in that respect.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, if my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] will reflect for a moment, he will see that this bill contemplates a new departure in the Indian policy. I assume, without being advised myself, that he is correct in saying that these transfers of Indians from one point to another have not been made, and indeed could not very well be made, without an act of Congress appropriating funds for the purpose. But if that be true, then the necessity for his amendment does not and can not exist; but I dislike in creating this commission to take any step backward or to deprive the Secretary of the power to avail himself of the advice of this commission, whose objects and duty it is to study the conditions and to look into the whole domestic concerns of the Indians. It would be unfortunate if a case should arise when if the Secretary of the Interior could exercise this power without act of Congress beneficially to the Indians and to the service generally we should take it from him.

Therefore, I think that while the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is entirely correct, and I should be glad to support it, I am unwilling to take from the Secretary of the Interior, when he has at his command the aid of the able commission contemplated by this bill, the power to do whatever he may do by way of concentration of these tribes now within the Indian Territory or elsewhere, so as to reduce the reservations, if it can be done without Congressional action. I submit, sir, that no one who reads the report of the present Secretary of the Interior, no one who understands the cast of mind and the make-up of that gentleman, can doubt for one moment that any action that he might take with reference to these people would be taken with the highest degree of both intelligence and conservatism.

Now, if a case should occur for the exercise of this power by the Secretary of the Interior with the aid of the commission contemplated by this bill—it might be a very small tribe, it might occur in one quarter or in another, within or without the Indian Territory proper—a case where a removal could be made without additional expense to the Government and without injury to the Indians themselves, or even with actual benefit to them—if, I say, such a case should occur, I think it might well be left to him to do it, and that, too, without reference to what has been the practice heretofore. To take away this power which has always existed, as my friend says, but which has not been generally exercised, may therefore hamper the Secretary in the work contemplated in the bill. I dare say that perhaps not a single instance of its exercise has occurred, and yet it might become necessary, and in that event the power ought to be lodged in the proper place for its exercise.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, unless this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] is adopted I am frank to say that I, for one, can not support this bill. Under the provisions of section 3 as it stands, without the amendment, it would be within the power of this commission and the Secretary of the Interior to colonize all the Northwestern Indians, or all the Indians for that matter, within the limits of my own State; and I, for one (and I think every gentleman who comes from any part of the country where they have Indians will agree with me), am utterly opposed to leaving that power of colonizing the Indians in any State of this Union or in any one particular place either with these commissioners or with the Secretary of the Interior. The power, it is conceded, has remained a long time in abeyance. I do not believe it has ever existed.

From the very nature of the case it could not exist where the Indians by treaty owned the reservations. But here in this bill, by implication, you attempt to enact that such a power does exist, and that these commissioners may exercise that power and colonize the Indians wherever they see fit in this country.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, it is not merely the question of protecting the Indian Territory, it is a question of protecting every State in this Union where Indians might be colonized. We do not want to have any body of officers endowed with power to colonize these Indians—to overslaugh the people of any portion of this country by colonizing the Indians there.

Mr. ROGERS. May I make a suggestion to my friend from Minnesota? Of course no such colonization as that which he mentions could be made without an appropriation; and in the second place, no transfer could of course be made where there were treaty stipulations. It is only where small tribes might occupy a territory under executive order, not under treaty, that a thing of that sort could be done.

Mr. NELSON. In my opinion, it is dangerous to leave the power of colonizing or removing Indians under any circumstances with any other body than the department of the Government which represents directly the people interested.

Mr. ROGERS. The power, so far as it has existed hitherto, has not proved dangerous.

Mr. NELSON. I desire now to say a few words in regard to the general features of this bill. I believe the bill in its main provisions to be a desirable measure. It is of the utmost importance that something of this kind should be enacted into law. All, or nearly all, of our proposed Indian legislation is referred from time to time to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for his opinion and advice. Technically we are supposed to get his opinion, which is deemed of considerable importance. As a matter of fact we get in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred merely the opinion of some subordinate or clerk receiving a salary of $1,500 or $1,800 a year.

Mr. NELSON. I wish I could have a little more time.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. NELSON.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that I regard it as of vital importance that a commission of this kind should be instituted. There is at present no branch or Department of the Government from which we can obtain any authentic or reliable information in regard to these different Indian reservations and the status of the various Indian tribes. All that we obtain now is information gathered by clerks and subordinates of the Indian Office from the different local Indian agents.

Indian agents, as we all know, are interested parties. It is to them a matter of great importance to swell the returns of the number of Indians at the different reservations, in order to get increased appropriations and larger allowances for annuities. It is of the utmost importance to them as Indian agents to retain their offices and their perquisites; and hence it is their interest that matters shall be kept in statu quo, that no changes shall be made in reference to the reservations. Their interests to a certain extent run side by side with those of the chiefs and headmen of the different tribes. They constitute, as may be said, a portion of the Indian oligarchy.

What we need and what this bill is designed to supply is some power or authority that can furnish this Government, especially the legislative department of it, with full, complete, and reliable information in reference to the Indian problem. We have large areas of land occupied by a few small scattered bodies of Indians—some of them partially civilized and some in their savage state. It is of the utmost importance when legislating in reference to these reservations and these isolated tribes that we have authentic and trustworthy information from men who have been on the ground, who have examined into the wants of the Indians and the needs of the people in the country surrounding the reservations.

I am led to these remarks from the experience I have had within the last two years as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. We have from time to time referred our measures to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and I have been curious enough to ascertain how and where the information furnished to us has been obtained. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs would refer our bill to some clerk or subordinate, who would pull out from a pigeon-hole the report of some Indian agent; and there would come to the committee of this House, ostensibly from the Commissioner, a voluminous report, based entirely upon the information of this Indian agent, and stating that this or that measure of Indian legislation ought to be adopted by the House, while at the same time it would be evident from the report itself that the recommendation came merely from a clerk knowing nothing at all about the subject-matter.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see that my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires to retain in this bill what seems to me a rather extraordinary power—a power on the part of the Secretary of the Interior or the Indian Department to exercise control over the public domain of this country in so far as to transfer Indians from one reservation to another, and thus make disposition of the lands of the Government without the consent of Congress. I think that all questions of this kind, especially questions affecting the settlement of the lands of this country, should be left at all times to the determination of Congress. However much confidence I may have in the present Secretary of the Interior—and no one, not excepting my friend from Arkansas, has more confidence in him than I have—I am unwilling that this discretionary power should be left with the head of any Department. In my judgment, all these questions ought to be reserved for the revision and determination of Congress.

For my part, I am opposed to the removal of any more Indians into the Indian Territory. I trust the time is not far distant when that whole country will be opened up to settlement by the white people; and I am unwilling in this bill to give the Secretary of the Interior or any commissioner or officer of the Government the power, express or implied, by which Indians may be settled in that country or may be removed from one reservation to another without the consent of Congress. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment of my friend from Kansas will prevail; and if it should fail I hope this bill will be defeated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question on the section and pending amendments.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Withhold it for a moment until I can offer an amendment to the third section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw it to let in the amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will explain the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. For one moment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Not for longer than one minute. The commission is not required to make any report of such legislation as they may recommend. The proviso is that no such arrangement shall be made involving a change of treaty which will be operative until ratified by Congress. My amendment is to add that said commission shall report to the Secretary of the Interior what legislation the committee recommend to be enacted affecting the Indian tribes which shall be laid before Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that is a good amendment.

Mr. LAIRD. I move to strike out the proviso entirely.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will not insist upon that. I demand the previous question.

Mr. LAIRD. It ought to be stricken out.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Oh, no.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and then Mr. WEAVER'S amendment was disagreed to.

The question next recurred on Mr. RYAN'S amendment.

Mr. RYAN. I withdraw the proviso.

The amendment was adopted.

The question next recurred on the following amendment of Mr. CUTCHEON:

Add after "Congress," in the seventeenth line, the following:
"Provided, further, That the said commission shall annually report to the Secretary of the Interior what legislation, if any, the commission recommend to be enacted for the civilization or otherwise affecting the Indian tribes; and the Secretary of the Interior shall lay the same before Congress at the beginning of each Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). There is no other amendment pending.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask by unanimous consent to make this bill a continuing special order. This is Saturday night, and it is impossible to complete the bill before the adjournment. I wish at the end of the bill to move an important section. If there be no objection, I will move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until some other time. If I can get an order made to consider it with the Oklahoma bill, which is of a kindred nature——

Mr. COWLES. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is Saturday evening and the House is thin; yet I think gentlemen present will be impressed with the importance of this bill and will acknowledge the propriety and necessity of this legislation in some form or other. I move that the bill be postponed until Saturday next.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the gentleman to accept "that it is not to interfere with prior orders."

Mr. HOLMAN. I would not like to do that.

Mr. HATCH. I move to amend the proposition "not to interfere with prior orders of the House."

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. My question is, that a prior order of the House is that Saturday's sessions shall be devoted to debate in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Heretofore the order was made until further order the session of Saturday should be devoted to debate. The Chair is informed that there has been a special order for next Saturday. If the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri be adopted it will virtually amount to fixing no day.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The free-ship bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move it be postponed until Saturday week.

Mr. COWLES. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves it be set down for Saturday week. The Clerk informs the Chair that also has been appropriated for the Indian Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to take the risk of that.

Mr. HATCH. Go on, and finish your bill now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the previous question on my motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 12.

Mr. COWLES. No quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is apparent no quorum is present, and I therefore withdraw the demand for the previous question and the motion to postpone, and ask the House to proceed with the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior may direct any two or more of the commissioners to take charge of, superintend, and put in operation the plans, not inconsistent with existing laws or treaties, which he may decide upon for the improvement of the condition of any of the tribes or bands of Indians. Where resurvey of the lines or remarking of the corners of old surveys may be found necessary in order to locate the Indians upon allotments of land in severalty upon any of the reservations, the work may, when practicable, be done under the direction of competent officers of the Army to be detailed for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the commissioners appointed from civil life under the provisions of the first section of this act shall be paid at the rate of —— dollars per diem while actually and necessarily employed in the service; and that each member of the commission detailed or appointed shall be paid his actual and necessary traveling expenses, including transportation; and for the purposes of this act the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior:

For payment of the traveling expenses, including transportation of the members of the commission, —— dollars.

For payment of the per diem for services of the civil members of the commission, —— dollars.

For expenses of resurveying any portions of the reservations, for ascertaining the exact number of Indians of the different tribes and bands, as hereinbefore required, for such clerical services as may be absolutely required, for stationery, rent of offices when necessary and away from Indian reservations, and for other necessary expenses, $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are certain amendments there proposed by the committee to fill the blanks.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 of section 5 fill the blank with the word "ten." In line 14 insert "ten thousand."

The amendments were agreed to.

In line 16 fill the blank by inserting the words "not drawing salaries, nine thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the next amendment is to strike out in line 22 of this section the word "five;" so that it will read "twenty thousand dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 5 down to and including the word "service," in line 4 of said section. Also strike out lines 15 and 16 of said section.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, this is to strike out that portion of this bill which provides for these commissioners who are to be appointed from civil life and their compensation, which is by the bill now fixed at the rate of $10 a day. With reference to that provision that they—the commission—shall have their necessary expenses paid, including transportation, I wish to say a word. What the other necessary expenses may be, including transportation, we had better go and investigate in the office of the clerk of this body and see what these have cost heretofore. There has been great complaint of these committees and commissions sent abroad in the country and the extravagant amount of the expenditures that are created by them.

I trust the motion to strike out will prevail. I do not think, under the circumstances, it is wise to permit this provision for the appointees from civil life at such compensation to remain in the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the previous question upon this section and amendments.

The question was taken on the amendments of Mr. COWLES, and the Chair announced that by the sound the amendments had been rejected.

Mr. COWLES. I call for a division.

Mr. HOLMAN. Too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was swift in announcing the result and does not think that advantage should be taken of the gentleman. The Chair recognizes the demand for a division.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 19, noes 65.

Mr. COWLES. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. COWLES and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN (before the tellers had completed their count). It is understood from the gentleman from North Carolina that the call for a quorum will be withdrawn, with the understanding that a vote may be taken upon this amendment, in case the bill passes, by yeas and nays in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am aware of that; but with that understanding the point of order will be withdrawn.

Mr. COWLES. Whenever the matter comes up on the passage of the bill, if it is understood that we may have a yea-and-nay vote on this portion of it, I will withdraw the call.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not agree to that.

Mr. COWLES. Then I insist upon the point of order that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 119.

Mr. COWLES. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places.

EVENING SESSION FOR EULOGIES ON THE LATE MICHAEL HAHN.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, as the House is to meet at 7.30 this evening for eulogies on the late Mr. HAHN, of Louisiana, I move that we now take a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the order fixes the time of meeting this evening, at 7 o'clock.

Mr. ST. MARTIN. This being the day fixed for the memorial services in honor of the late MICHAEL HAHN, I ask that the House take a recess until 7.30 o'clock to consider the special order fixed for this day.

SALE OF GOODS, ETC., BY SAMPLE.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, pending that motion, to present a minority report from the Committee on Commerce on House bill 1621 in relation to the sale of goods and merchandise by sample.

There was no objection, and the views of the minority were ordered to be printed to accompany the report of the committee.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana that the House take a recess until 7.30 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at 7.30 p. m., and was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read a letter from the SPEAKER.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 15, 1886.

SIR: I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

EULOGIES ON LATE HON. MICHAEL HAHN.

Mr. ST. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, the House is convened under special order that we may pay a tribute of respect to the memory of our deceased colleague, the late Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, a Representative from the State of Louisiana, and I send to the Clerk's desk resolutions which I ask to have read and considered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That in the demise of our late colleague the country has suffered the loss of a wise legislator, a valuable citizen, and an able and faithful public servant.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. ST. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, in offering these resolutions I feel it incumbent upon me to give a brief sketch of the life and public services of my late friend and colleague.

MICHAEL HAHN was born in Bavaria on the 24th day of November, 1830. When an infant, his widowed mother emigrated to the United States, landing at New York and subsequently moving to New Orleans, La. He attended the public schools, and, after graduating from the high school of the city, entered the law office of that most eminent jurist, the late Christian Roselius. After graduating in the law department of the University of Louisiana he entered upon the practice of his profession, conjoining with it the duties of a notary public.

At an early age he was elected a school director and served for several years. During the late war between the States, in 1862, he was elected to Congress, but was not admitted to his seat until the 7th of February, 1863. After the expiration of his Congressional term he was appointed prize commissioner at New Orleans, during which period he purchased the New Orleans True Delta, which he conducted editorially for some time as a Republican journal. He was inaugurated March 4, 1864, as the first Republican governor of Louisiana as a free State—receiving from President Lincoln on the 15th of the same month the additional powers of military governor. This mark of esteem and confidence on the part of President Lincoln Governor Hahn cherished as a marked distinction and held it as the highest of his honors.

I well remember that the day before his untimely death—when he seemed to have fully recovered his health, and not supposing then that we were to part that day to meet no more, I told him in a playful manner that I was glad to be spared the trouble of preparing his eulogy. He smilingly said: "My eulogy would have given you little trouble. It could have been written in a few words. It would have been necessary simply to have stated that I enjoyed the friendship and confidence of the martyr President." At the same time he presented the following for my perusal:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., March 13, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: I congratulate you on having fixed your name in history as the first free-State governor of Louisiana. Now that you are about to have a convention, which, among other things, will probably define the elective franchise, I barely suggest, for your private consideration, whether some of the colored people may not be let in, as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks. They would probably help, in some trying time to come, to keep the jewel of liberty in the family of freedom. But this is only a suggestion, not to the public, but to you alone.

Yours, truly,

A. LINCOLN.

Hon. MICHAEL HAHN.

Having been elected to the Senate of the United States, he resigned the governorship, but did not press his claim to his Senatorial seat. After having filled with credit and usefulness several appointive positions, he withdrew to his country place at Hahnville, in the parish of Saint Charles, where he secured so fully the confidence of his neighbors that he was elected, almost without opposition, police juror, representative to the State Legislature, and district judge, serving as such until March 3, 1885, when he resigned to enter upon his duties in the Forty-ninth Congress. His term of service in this House, though short, gave promise of great usefulness and activity, and had the fatal archer spared his life he would have made his mark in this Hall, and his Congressional career would have been one of unusual splendor and success.

Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to enjoy relations of personal friendship with Governor Hahn for more than thirty years, and although differing in our political faith, still it affords me pleasure to bear witness that his record as a citizen was such as endeared him to all who knew him. He was noted for the gentleness of his manners and kindliness of his disposition. He was a scholarly man of great ability, coupled with great modesty. He possessed pleasing and winning manners, and in all his social relations he bore the character of an estimable, generous, kindly, and true man.

Like many other bright men, he has been cut down at the threshold of a career full of promise, and which would have brought additional luster to an already honored name, and given a broader scope to his public career. Imbued with a laudable ambition to acquire distinction for devotion to his adopted country, fealty to his party, and fidelity to his friends, he was ever governed in his conduct by a conscientious desire to perform his whole duty as became a man, a citizen, and a public servant. His success was achieved under most perplexing and embarrassing circumstances—standing at one period almost alone in his advocacy of moderation, conciliation, and justice. His conservatism commanded the respect of his political opponents and secured a confidence which was evinced by their votes. On the other hand, he supplied to his own party its safest and wisest counsel and its ablest leadership.

This much is honestly due the memory of my deceased colleague; and, in closing, I can but say that by his death this body has lost a member who would have taken high rank as a legislator and made a record that would have been alike creditable to himself and to the State which he represented.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, a colored fireman at Willard's Hotel, this city, making his early rounds, unlocked the door of room No. 16, on the second floor, at half past 6 o'clock on the morning of March 15, 1886, and stepped softly into the room to kindle a fire for the comfort of its occupant. He had advanced but a step toward the open grate when he discovered that occupant lying prone upon his back and surrounded by a pool of blood. Astounded by the discovery, he ran affrighted into the hall, down the neighboring stairs, and pulled up in breathless state at the office counter, where he related in a tremor of nervous excitement what he had just seen. He was confident that it was a case of suicide, and to his terror-stricken gaze there appeared to be a gaping wound in the dead man's throat.

The night-clerk and the keeper of the neighboring hack-stand, who happened to be present, ran up the stairs as rapidly as the servant had descended them, and were themselves in turn horrified by the appalling sight.

The room was the one occupied by Representative MICHAEL HAHN, of the second Congressional district of Louisiana, who was found lying upon the floor in the manner described. He was in his night-dress, which was deeply stained about the bosom with blood, and in his right hand was clutched a handkerchief. The left was drawn up toward the body, as if to press the side to ease pain. The feet were toward the grate and near the fender, showing that the dead man had stood leaning against the mantel, and in his exhaustion from the loss of blood had fallen full length backward. Further examination of the room told the rest of the melancholy story.

The sick man, finding he was discharging blood through the mouth, had left his bed and walked across to the mantel. The discharge continued copiously there, as was plainly to be seen, and also after he had fallen exhausted to the floor. The expression of the face was calm and free from pain. The servant's story of suicide and of a gaping wound in the throat was, of course, merely a matter of the imagination. Death had resulted from the bursting of a blood vessel near the heart. Thus died MICHAEL HAHN, who, coming to America a child and friendless, had carved out for himself a notable career, illustrating the possibilities within the reach of every American citizen, whether native-born or foreign, under the liberal and benign institutions of our beloved country.

The deceased was born in Bavaria, on the Rhine, on the 24th of November, 1830. When he was quite an infant his widowed mother with five children came to the United States, stopping a short time in New York and Texas and finally settling in New Orleans about 1840. The mother died of yellow fever in 1841. Young Hahn was educated in the public schools of the city, and after finishing his course entered upon the study of law. In April, 1851, he graduated from the law department of the University of Louisiana with the degree of LL. B. This diploma admitted him to practice in all the courts of the State. He immediately engaged in the practice of his profession. When but twenty-two years of age he was elected a school director and served for several years, being at one time president of the board.

Politically he identified himself with the Democratic party, adhering to that wing of the party whose recognized head was Stephen A. Douglas, whom he supported for the Presidency in 1860. He was a member of the Douglas State committee.

After the disruption of the Charleston convention a large Union mass-meeting was held at Lafayette Square, New Orleans, May 8, 1860, at which HAHN made a strong Union speech and offered the resolutions adopted by the meeting.

He continued zealous and persistent in his opposition to secession. The State seceded. After secession the legislative authorities required all officers of the State to take a new oath of office, which prescribed a pledge to be faithful "to the constitution and laws of the Confederate States." He refused to subscribe to the oath, and on the arrival of Farragut and Butler at New Orleans was prominent in forming Union associations and in reconstructing the State.

In December, 1862, there was an election for Congress in the two districts of the State then entirely within the Federal lines, and HAHN, after a candidacy of but a few days, was elected from the second district, receiving more votes than the other three candidates together. He was not admitted to his seat until February, 1863. During his short stay in Congress he voted for all the war measures of President Lincoln, and he and the President very soon became close friends. After the expiration of his Congressional term he was appointed prize commissioner of New Orleans.

During this year (1863) he made a number of speeches in favor of President Lincoln's policy to re-establish a loyal State government in Louisiana, and in a speech at Lyceum Hall, New Orleans, in November, 1863, he declared for the abolition of slavery in the whole State.

In January, 1864, he took charge as owner and editor of the New Orleans Daily True Delta, in which he advocated emancipation, being the first paper ever owned by a Louisianian to do so. On the reconstruction of the State government on a loyal basis, February, 1864, Mr. HAHN was elected the first free-State governor, and was inducted into office in March following. In the same month President Lincoln invested him with the additional powers of a military governor.

A reconstruction constitution for the State having been declared adopted, a legislature was elected thereunder, which, in January, 1865, elected Governor HAHN to the United States Senate for six years. In consequence of this election he resigned the office of governor, but never pressed his claim to a seat in the Senate.

On the 4th of July, 1865, he made a speech at the emancipation celebration in Washington, which was widely circulated.

A few months later he made a speech before the Equal Suffrage Association of Washington, which also obtained wide circulation.

In 1867 he became editor and manager of the New Orleans Daily Republican, and continued with eminent success in that position until 1871. During this time he received the appointment of administrator of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans. On quitting journalistic life he retired to his plantation in Saint Charles Parish. Here he laid out and built the pretty and thriving village of Hahnville.

He was made a school director of Saint Charles Parish, and repeatedly elected to represent the parish in the Legislature of the State. In 1872 he served as president of the Louisiana State educational convention during its three days' session.

While in the Legislature he served as chairman of the committee on the judiciary and a short time as speaker.

In 1876 he was appointed State registrar of voters; in 1878 he was unanimously elected police juror for his parish, and in June, 1878, was appointed by the President superintendent of the United States mint at New Orleans, which position he held until January, 1879.

In November, 1879, he was elected by an almost unanimous vote judge of the district composed of the parishes of Jefferson, Saint Charles, and Saint John, and was unanimously re-elected to that position in 1884. In November, 1884, he was the Republican nominee for Congress in the second Congressional district of the State. He had repeatedly refused the nomination, but toward the close of the campaign, two weeks before the election, being pressed to accept, he yielded and became a candidate. His election in a district usually Democratic by 3,000 majority attested his great popularity with the people in and out of his own political party.

In consequence of his election to Congress he resigned his judgeship in March, 1885, and was serving in Congress with usefulness to his State and credit to himself when stricken down by the icy hand of death.

It is thus seen that MICHAEL HAHN had long been a conspicuous figure in the public and political affairs of Louisiana, and his career is one of which any man might well be proud.

Though an active, consistent Republican from the earliest days of that party's existence in the South, Governor HAHN always enjoyed the esteem and respect of even his bitterest political opponents. He was recognized as a man of unswerving integrity and sincere devotion to principle, and it was because of this that he was enabled to retain the respect and esteem of the people generally, notwithstanding his affiliation with a party which had made itself justly odious in the State.

Of all the leading Republicans in Louisiana he was one of the least objectionable.

He was—

Said an editorial in a New Orleans paper, speaking of his death—

among the few men prominently connected with reconstruction who enjoyed the respect and esteem of the community, whose life was honorable, and whose record would bear scrutiny.

In disposition Governor HAHN was warm-hearted and genial, and his courteous demeanor toward all with whom he came in contact drew around him a large circle of devoted friends.

In positions of trust he was inflexible in the performance of his duty; in his social relations he bore the character of an estimable, generous, kindly, and true man.

His popularity in the immediate community in which he lived was unexampled; his people loved him. A number of citizens in the village of Hahnville draped their houses in black when the announcement of his death was made.

The bar of the district over which he had presided as judge adopted the following tribute to his memory on March 22—a few days after his death:

Resolved, That in the death of the late MICHAEL HAHN the country at large, the State of Louisiana, and especially the district represented by him in Congress, have suffered a loss deeply to be deplored and difficult to be repaired.

Resolved further, That as a gentleman he was without reproach, as a politician he was incorruptible, as a judge he was learned, just, and patient, and as a citizen he was accessible to all, courteous without subserviency, stern without asperity, enterprising without extravagance, appreciated and beloved by high and low as trustworthy and energetic, and a man of high power and remarkable intellect, without false pride.

Mr. Speaker, a good man has gone from among us in the noontide of his usefulness as a member of this House; one who, whether on the bench, in the executive office, or in the State or National Legislature, was recognized by his contemporaries as just, honest, and capable. And such will be the judgment of posterity.

Peace to his ashes!

Mr. O'DONNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is a mournful pleasure to have been invited to pay a tribute to the memory of one who deserved so well of his associates. My acquaintance with Governor HAHN began soon after the opening of the present session, and from familiar conversations I grew to esteem him highly. He was modest and retiring, but even in the few weeks he served here he gathered about him many friends. You remember the suddenness of his demise; while those who knew him had noted his absence from his accustomed place, no one thought death near until his end was announced.

His departure from earthly scenes teaches us the frail tenure of existence here; it was an impressive admonition of the brevity and uncertainty of life, an exemplification of the hollowness of ambition and the emptiness of office. It is indeed sad to contemplate that this quiet man should be forced into such rude acquaintance with death, that the rending of soul and body should be accompanied with such terrible suffering. Little did he or I realize at our last friendly interchange of thought that he stood on the very threshold of eternity, that the conqueror of all mankind was already beckoning him to its cold embrace, that his soul should so soon go forth on the mystic journey to the hereafter.

No native of the soil of Louisiana loved the State more than this its adopted son. I remember, sir, when I first began service in this body I offered a bill which he thought, if it became a law, would affect a great industry in Louisiana, and he at once came to me to discuss the provisions of the measure, pointing out the injury he feared it might entail upon the people of the State he served and cherished. This son of a foreign monarchy loved liberty and our institutions; indeed his example taught patriotism to the children of the land; his devotion to the nation was often tried in the crucible of persecution, but he ever remained true to freedom and union.

Representative HAHN lived nearly fifty-six years. More than a third of that life was passed in the service of the people, and, though elevated to high positions where avarice could have its sway, it is recorded to the honor of this public servant that he died poor in this world's goods. He was the just executive, the erudite jurist, and the faithful Representative. During the fierce contests in the section where he lived no one ever assailed his purity or the integrity of his intentions. Even during the last political strife, a campaign when plummet and press fathomed greater depths of acrimony and injustice in the political sea than any before, the fierce light did not beat upon him with withering rays, and he came here the accredited Representative of the better elements of each party in his district. He sought to serve his people and the Commonwealth which he in part represented on this floor.

The only time we heard his voice was when he appealed for the interests of Louisiana to promote the prosperity of its great undertaking. We all remember a bill he offered and urged its passage. It was to remove a bitter reminder to his constituency of the struggle of two decades agone. He hoped to see the prejudices of the past "dissolve like the winter drifts in the sunshine of spring," and rejoiced that they were yielding to the inevitable influences of time.

Our late associate was of a genial nature and loved harmony. I remember just before he left this House the wound inflicted on him by party reflection and the mournful manner in which he read to me an article from a journal in his State and expressed the hurt he felt from its injustice.

Little did its author realize the one he assailed would so soon join the vanished procession of men who were. Ah, Mr. Speaker, we can but deplore partisan malice, while kindly feeling and justice are lost on the arid waste of political controversy. It is one of the lamentable accompaniments of our institutions that the sincerest and most upright intentions are too often refracted by party atmosphere from their aim. As I think of my friend who is gone, I am mournfully reminded of the truth of the Arab proverb: "The word that we speak to-day, shall it not meet us again and again at the turning of the ways to show us how it has cursed or blessed our fellows."

The evidences of respect and regard for the memory of our departed brother, shown by those in whose midst his honorable life was passed, were a comfort to relatives and friends. To them it was a sweet blossom of the thorny wreath of sorrow. In the harsh and cruel contests of the troublous times and contentions which convulsed his State much that was unkind came to the surface, but in the calmer years of retrospect happily "death holds a flag of truce over its own; under that flag friend and foe sit peacefully together—passions stilled, benevolence restored, wrongs repaired, and justice done." As time passes, bitterness and acrimony are forgotten. Blessed be the kindly feeling! And as the past is viewed through the mellowing atmosphere of time old friendships are renewed, and the grateful seed of charity and forbearance bring forth a fruitage whose harvests blossom for all eternity.

Among the precious legacies left by the past our dead friend prized the letters written him by the martyr President Lincoln. They embodied the thoughts of that most imperial brain penned during "the great evolution of history—that creative act, so to speak, which still exercises an influence over the destinies of mankind." The great ruler regarded him with warm feeling, commended his moderation and wise use of power, and gratefully acknowledged his devotion to country, liberty, and law. Well may his heart have been animated with just pride as he read the lines, as he often did, traced by the hand that lifted up humanity and made the flag the honest emblem of a free and happy nation.

The life of Judge HAHN has closed. It is a tribute to the genius of our institutions that the child of another clime came to our shores and his worth so recognized to call him to the highest places in the gift of his people, for they were his people and he was theirs. He sought to build anew the broken fortunes of the section where his lot was cast. In all positions of responsibility and trust he exercised their powers wisely and well, with an eye single to the prosperity and advancement of the nation and those whom he served.

The useful life is over. With him the world's sun has gone down in the shadow of death, but to emerge in the full light of God's eternal day. Farewell, true patriot and friend of freedom. Thy days on earth have been for the benefit of others more than for thine own, and as we give voice to the praise due departed worth, we bestow upon you the well-earned commendation: You left your country better than you found it. What more need be said?

Therefore on thy unknown way,
Go in God's peace! We shall stay,
But a little while delay.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, my personal acquaintance with MICHAEL HAHN began on the first day of the present session of Congress, when, as the result of the chance by which our respective places in this Hall are determined, I found myself allotted to a seat immediately on the right of that occupied by the Representative of the second district of Louisiana. From that time there sprang up between us a friendship which continued steadfast, warm, and sincere until the hour of his sudden and unexpected death.

But while, personally, until that time he had been a stranger to me, he was not by me entirely unknown. Our deceased companion is a historic character in the annals of this country for the last quarter of a century. Being familiar with the history of his varied and eventful career, it was with a good amount of interest that I watched the appearance in the House of the only representative of his party and of mine from the State of Louisiana.

As we learn from the Congressional Directory, Mr. HAHN was not to the manor born. He was not a native of the land he loved so well, and owed no natural allegiance to the Government which he served so faithfully. He was born in Bavaria, November 24, 1830, whence he came when an infant, brought by his widowed mother, to the United States, landing in New York, and afterward removing to the city of New Orleans, which city and vicinity continued to be his home until his death. Like the majority of American youth, his education was that of the public schools. He graduated from the high school of the second municipality of his adopted city. He studied law in the office of Christian Roselius, esq., and attended lectures in the law department of the University of Louisiana, from which department he graduated April 7, 1851, before he had reached his majority.

He at once commenced the practice of his chosen profession. His ability to serve the people was promptly recognized, and when but twenty-two years of age he was elected a member of the school board of the city of New Orleans, and was made its president. In the days prior to the civil war he was in politics a Democrat, and a follower of Stephen A. Douglas, making Union speeches, and by all the power he could command opposed secession. And even after his State had taken the fatal step he still remained loyal to the Union, and refused to take an oath requiring allegiance to the Confederate States government. When the State of Louisiana again fell into the hands of the Federal authorities he took an active and a prominent part in the reconstruction of the State, and was the trusted friend and adviser of President Lincoln. In 1862 he was elected to Congress, and in February, 1863, took his seat in this Hall as a Representative of the people of Louisiana.

At the expiration of his Congressional term he was appointed prize commissioner of New Orleans. He at this time also began the career of a journalist. He purchased and edited the New Orleans Daily True Delta, and, true to the principles he had always entertained, he was a fearless and powerful advocate of emancipation. He was elected, and on March 4, 1864, was inaugurated, the first governor of Louisiana as a free State, to which was added during the same month by the appointment of President Lincoln the duties and powers of military governor. In January, 1865, he resigned the office of governor, having been chosen to represent his State in the United States Senate. Owing to the disturbed and unsettled condition of the country at that time he did not press his claim, and was not admitted to a seat in the Senate. As a result of his devotion to what he deemed the best interests of his State and country, in 1866, during the progress of a riot in New Orleans, he received a gunshot wound, which went with him to his grave, and made him a cripple from that time to the end of his life.

In 1867 he became editor and manager of the New Orleans Daily Republican, and was also appointed administrator of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans. In 1871 he added to his other duties and vocations that of a sugar planter, and removed to his sugar plantation in Saint Charles Parish, where he laid out and built the village of Hahnville. He was a school director of Saint Charles Parish, and in May, 1872, served as president of the Louisiana State educational convention. During the years 1872, 1874, and 1876 he was a member of the Legislature of his State. He was superintendent of the United States mint at New Orleans in 1878, and during the fearful ravages and excitement of the yellow-fever epidemic of that year he remained at his post, faithful to his trust.

In November, 1879, he was elected judge of his district, and unanimously re-elected in 1884, in which position he served until his term as a member of the Forty-ninth Congress began. His career as a youth in a strange land, as a man, as a citizen, as a student, as an educator, as a lawyer, as a judge, as a journalist, as a politician, and as a patriot, is worthy of all commendation, and challenges the admiration and imitation of every American. His death was wholly unanticipated by his friends and himself. He had been absent from his seat for several days on account of what he and all supposed was only a slight and a temporary indisposition. On the Friday evening previous to his death on Monday morning, I met him for, as events proved, the last time in life, on this floor. He greeted me cheerfully and said he was feeling better than he had for a long time, and that on Monday morning he would be again regularly in his seat. How little thought I then that one week from that day, and almost at the same hour of the day, I should as one of a committee of this House assist in the sad duty of laying his mortal remains away to their final rest in the silent city of the dead, the beautiful cemetery Metairie, hard by the Crescent City, the Queen of the South, the city of his adoption and of his labors.

How shocked was I when on that Monday morning, coming to the House expecting to find my genial neighbor in his seat, to find that seat draped in the habiliments of mourning and to be told that Mr. HAHN was dead! Our deceased friend was a man who appears to have won the esteem of all classes, races, and conditions of his follow-citizens. This trait of his character was strikingly illustrated at the funeral obsequies at his home in New Orleans. All classes, rich and poor, high and low, Anglo-Saxon and African, from the governor of the State and State and city officials to the humblest member of society, appeared to feel that the Commonwealth and the community of his immediate home had met with a great loss, and they all came together and mingled their tears at his bier.

MICHAEL HAHN had the confidence of all who knew him. He was the only Representative of his political faith from his State. Yet a tribute of inestimable value was paid him in the sincere sorrow at his death shown by his colleagues from his own State, differing from him politically so radically as they do. I stood by the side of one of those gentlemen at the services held in this city, and he said Mr. HAHN had got beyond the plane of mere politics, and was a statesman who could act for what he believed to be the best interest of his State and country. He said, "MICHAEL HAHN could always be relied upon. I always knew where to find him." What higher tribute could be paid to his worth? In this connection I may be pardoned for mentioning an incident which occurred during the earlier days of our present session, which illustrates this phase of his character, his devotion to the interests of the people he represented, and also the extreme modesty of the man and his distrust of himself and of his abilities.

We had under consideration the bill or resolution authorizing the sending of certain property of the United States to the New Orleans Exposition, a proposition which was generally opposed by his party associates. I asked him what he would do about it. His answer was characteristic of the man: "I shall favor it; I think it will assist in developing the resources of my State, and I shall not only vote for it but I must speak for it, even if I am a new member here." And he did speak and made an eloquent plea for it. When he sat down, with his usual distrust of himself he asked: "Did I make a fool of myself and hurt the cause?" While he was thus modest and distrustful of himself, there was one phase of his life of which he was justly proud, and of which he was wont to speak, and that was the friendship and confidence of Abraham Lincoln. With what pardonable and justifiable pride did he use to exhibit to his friends the autograph letters of that great man to him, asking his advice upon questions of reconstruction and commending his patriotic and judicious efforts in that direction!

The career of our departed colaborer is one of which his friends may well be proud. The man who, under the peculiar circumstances surrounding our country during his active life, with all the disadvantages of foreign birth, could live a lifetime in a community which was necessarily opposed to him in sentiment on almost every question and sustain himself and retain the entire confidence, support, and esteem of everybody was no ordinary man.

He has gone. In his death his adopted country and State have lost a patriotic, devoted, and useful citizen, his city and district a faithful and earnest Representative, and his friends a steadfast ally. Peace to the ashes of MICHAEL HAHN. Let all that is mortal of our dead companion rest in the quiet tomb to which loving hands have consigned his remains until the trump of the resurrection morn shall call us all to appear before the great Judge to give an account of the deeds done in the body; and if he shall then rise to a future as happy as his life was useful to his country and to his fellows, his warmest friends can desire no better fate for him we mourn.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, in obedience to a graceful custom, we are convened in this Hall to pay our tributes of respect and esteem to the memory of a deceased member of this House. Not alone do the proprieties sanctioned by past Congresses impel us to these services. The associations of this House form a peculiar bond of union between us. We come here strangers to each other. We take these seats, and each looks in the other's face with courteous civility or, it may be, with idle curiosity. But as day follows day, and members join in the work of legislation, meet in committee-rooms or on this floor, consult, antagonize, compare and contrast opinions, and struggle with the problems before them, there arises a common interest in the well-being and destiny of all and of every one which can never be wholly effaced. And when death's pale flag enters this Chamber, and at his summons a brother leaves his chair and departs to return no more, all hearts are moved by the bonds of good-will here cemented to speak the last farewell, to strew flowers on his new-made grave, and to place on the printed page an appreciative estimate of those qualities which elevated him to this distinguished post of honor and responsibility.

Animated by these emotions, I gladly avail myself of this occasion to offer my brief tribute to the life and character of MICHAEL HAHN. My personal acquaintance with Mr. HAHN covered a period of scarcely more than three months, but during that brief time I had not failed to observe that he was a man of a calm, conservative, judicious temperament, full of experience in public affairs, firm and decided in his views, but gentle in his expression of them. He was evidently a man whom it would be safe to follow. I was attracted toward him by his quiet and unassuming manners and interesting conversation. In him were happily blended those qualities of mind and heart which would make him, as he was from earliest manhood to the day of his death, the trusted public servant of those among whom his lot was most intimately cast. What a remarkable record of public service was his! Without the influence of birth or fortune, born in a foreign land, almost from infancy the son of a widow, he had scarcely attained his majority when he was selected for school director, and from that time onward the rolling years succeed each other not so rapidly as honor succeeded to honor and trust to trust, until in the plenitude of his influence and usefulness, but it may be believed not in the plenitude of his honors, we mournfully draped his chair in this national House of Representatives, and tenderly escorted his remains to their last resting-place among the people who loved him so well and trusted him so much.

Nor were his public trusts more remarkable for their number than their variety. In all departments of public service, educational, legislative, judicial, and executive, he seemed equally at home. It may not perhaps be said that in any special attribute was he notably endowed. Others may be undoubtedly named who were more eloquent than he, others more learned, others of stronger intellects. But he was eloquent, he was learned, he was strong, because he was faithful—faithful with an ingenuous, noble, inspiring faithfulness, which bore him successfully and triumphantly through the rugged and sometimes dangerous paths of his eventful career, and made him equal to the performance of every duty. In war and in peace he was ever the same calm, conservative, faithful man.

He loved his country. He never forgot his allegiance to her. When the war of the rebellion carried the whole people of the South willingly or unwillingly into its vortex, MICHAEL HAHN stood aloof, and was foremost in all measures for the maintenance of the Federal Union as our fathers had established it. Considering the circumstances in which he was placed, this part of his career distinguishes him as a remarkable man. By his election as the first governor of Louisiana as a free State, by his position as military governor under Abraham Lincoln, by his advocacy of the emancipation of the slaves, he acquired a national reputation, and has written his name in indelible characters on the scroll of his country's history.

By this devotion to his adopted country and the perpetuity of her institutions MICHAEL HAHN made fitting recognition of what she had done for him. His career furnishes another illustration of the beneficence of our beloved land to all her children, native and adopted. Coming to our shores a fatherless boy, the doors of the public schools of the country opened to receive him. Without money and without price, competent teachers guided his tottering feet into paths of learning and opened to his youthful mind store-houses of knowledge. He emerged from the public school well equipped to enter on the study of that most difficult and intricate science, the law. At the age of manhood that same country placed him on a stage of action where all men were equal, equal under the law, equal in opportunity, equal in the inspiration which American representative government breathes into all her children. How well he availed himself of these privileges is clearly written on the pages of his life and will long be treasured in the memory of those to whom he was a true friend, a faithful adviser, and a devoted public servant.

Mr. PETTIBONE. In the late months of 1863, after the fall of Vicksburg and the surrender at Port Hudson, when the Mississippi was again opened from its source to the sea, it became my fortune to arrive at New Orleans with a large contingent of the Federal Army; and then and there I first made the acquaintance of our late associate, Hon. MICHAEL HAHN. He was then in power in the great city of the South, New Orleans; but I believe that they who will recall that time, the citizens of Louisiana in the dread period of the civil war, will always remember that when in power he so bore himself and carried his faculties so meek, with such just and scrupulous equity in looking after the rights and interests of all, as that the whole of the people of Louisiana who came in contact with him at that time felt that in him they had a safe adviser, a true and warm and steadfast friend.

This man, as has already been stated, was born under a foreign sky beyond the sea. In early life he sought the shores of America. He came to this country as thousands had come before him, believing that here was larger scope and verge and room for those who desired to enjoy the blessings of liberty for themselves and their posterity; and Louisiana became his foster-mother. As the years went by he grew into the full stature of American citizenship and manhood.

The great civil war which was then before us, which was too much for the wisdom of Clay and Calhoun and Webster and the sages of that now elder time to avert, because the reasons and the causes of it lay back almost within the Middle Ages—that great civil war was in front of MICHAEL HAHN in his early manhood. Through that dark ordeal he passed as did the citizens of his State and his section of the Union.

When the war closed divergent interests, sharp passions, keen antagonisms, virulent partisanship had their influence and their power, as we all know, over the States that had thrown their interests with the confederacy. We look back upon it now as we look back upon the history of the Revolution or the great rebellion in the time of Cromwell. A generation of men have been born since that time. To-day and now we can come, and with calmness and clearness of mind can measure men not as they would have been measured in the olden days, but as we now see them, surrounded by the circumstances which environed them in that time and in the light which subsequent experience has cast upon it.

It is well for any one of us that, when life's journey is done, it can be said of him he was honest, he was true, he was discreet, he was patriotic, he desired and loved the just.

Knowing MICHAEL HAHN a generation ago, and then having been separated from him by the long years that have passed, when I learned that he was elected to this Congress and was made a member of my committee I joyfully renewed the old acquaintance, and I found him what he was in the dark days of 1861 to 1865, only broader, and widened, and ripened.

In him the elements were mixed. All the elements were so combined that Nature might stand up and say to all the world, This was a man! That he was a man of broad principle, of profound conviction, and that he had the moral courage to breast all time and all circumstance, I think will be admitted by all who knew him. The Quaker poet Whittier (and in one of the last conversations I had with Mr. HAHN he quoted Whittier) has described the character of this man and his aspirations for what was right and just in the little poem wherein he brings the Angel of Freedom and the Angel of Peace together in the dark time which we call our civil war, when, to the pleadings of the Angel of Peace for a surcease of battle, the Angel of Freedom replied:

> Then Freedom sternly said: I shun
> No pang nor strife beneath the sun
> When Human Rights are staked and won.
> I knelt with Ziska's hunted flock;
> I watched in Touissaint's cell of rock;
> I walked with Sidney to the block.
> The moor of Marston felt my tread:
> Through Jersey's snows the march I led;
> My voice Magenta's charges sped.

That was the spirit with which MICHAEL HAHN stood up in those dark days in Louisiana. But it happened to him that, as the years went by and age came on, the people of Louisiana came to regard him, as he was, as a true citizen of their State, wishing only the best things for the State and for all the Southland and for all the Republic. That the man fought life's battle well, that he was an honored citizen of his Commonwealth and of the nation, was attested by the fact that he was sent as a Representative to this the Forty-ninth Congress, when long years had interposed between the sharp antagonisms of the past and the present time.

> No farther seek his merits to disclose,
> Or draw his frailties from their dread abode
> (There they alike in trembling hope repose),
> The bosom of his Father and his God.

Mr. GAY. Mr. Chairman, this occasion has been set apart by solemn resolution to pay the just tribute of respect to the memory of Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, of Louisiana.

It often happens in intercourse with our fellow-men that we do not fully appreciate their value until the rude hand of death removes them from our midst. This I feel to be especially true with regard to my deceased colleague, and when made aware of his untimely, unlooked-for death, I awoke to a partial realization of the great loss sustained by this House, by his colleagues, by his constituency, and by the State of Louisiana.

MICHAEL HAHN was a native of Bavaria, and removed in 1840 with a widowed mother to the city of New Orleans, in the tenth year of his age. His mother had five children, and when the yellow-fever epidemic of 1841 visited that city she fell a victim, leaving these children, doubly orphaned, in a strange land.

The solid metal of young MICHAL'S nature may be seen by watching the progress of events. He attended the public schools and graduated in the high school of the second municipality. In his nineteenth year we find him in the law office of Christian Roselius, an eminent lawyer, whose pure and unblemished character no doubt stamped itself on young HAHN.

While here, besides attending to the duties of the office, he followed two courses of lectures in the law department of the University of Louisiana, and graduated in April, 1851.

During his study of the law he earned his livelihood by attention to the agency of real estate, with which he was intrusted, and by writing short articles for the press, for which he developed an early taste. His diploma admitted him to all the courts of the State, and he immediately commenced the practice of law, blending with this the duties of a notary public, receiving his commission in 1851.

When but twenty-two years of age he was elected a school director and served on the committee on teachers with such men as Rawle, Jennings, and Bonford. This position he filled several times, and was at one time president of the board and ex officio chairman of the committee on teachers and high schools.

In politics Mr. HAHN was a Democrat and a member of the Douglas State committee, supporting Stephen A. Douglas for President. After the disruption of the Charleston convention he was pronounced in his attachment to the perpetuation of the Union, and when in 1861 all persons holding office were required by the Louisiana Legislature to swear allegiance to the confederate government he declined.

On the arrival of Farragut and Butler at New Orleans Mr. HAHN was recognized as a Union man, and became prominent in devising means for the re-establishment of the State government within the lines of Federal control.

On the 3d of December, 1862, elections for Congress were held in the first and second districts of Louisiana, then entirely within the Federal lines. Mr. HAHN was elected in the second district, receiving more votes than his three competitors, Darrell, Greathouse, and Jacob Barker, together, but was not admitted to his seat until the 17th of February, 1863.

During his short stay in Congress he became an intimate friend of President Lincoln, whose confidence he enjoyed. During the year 1863 he was appointed and acted as prize commissioner at New Orleans. He was appointed by General Banks with two others commissioners to liquidate the affairs of the Bank of Louisiana; but on his recommendation the appointments were revoked and the bank allowed to settle its own affairs.

On the reconstruction of the State government on a loyal basis (22d of February, 1864) he was elected the first free-State governor, and was inducted into office on the 4th of March following, and on the 15th of the same month he was invested with the additional powers of a military governor by President Lincoln.

A constitutional convention was elected and submitted a constitution, which was ratified. A legislature was elected, and in January, 1865, Governor HAHN was chosen as Senator to the Senate of the United States for six years. He resigned his position as governor, to take effect on the 4th of March, 1865. He never pressed his claim to a seat in the Senate, because he approved of the reconstruction measures which were then being matured.

As a journalist, his experience was extensive. On the 1st of January, 1864, he took charge of the New Orleans Daily True Delta. In 1867 he formed a corporation for publishing the New Orleans Daily Republican, of which paper he continued to be the manager and editor till 1871 with eminent success.

On retiring from editorial life he went to reside on his plantation in Saint Charles Parish. He laid out thereon the thriving village of Hahnville. Here he was made a school director, and in 1872 was elected to the Legislature.

In May, 1872 he served as president of the Louisiana State educational convention during its session of three days. He was elected to the Legislature three successive terms, in 1872, 1874, 1876, generally without opposition.

He served as chairman of the committee on the judiciary and a short time as speaker.

On the 15th of August, 1876, he was appointed registrar of voters, and although much discussion took place concerning the irrgularity of the election that year, both political parties approved of the conduct of MICHAEL HAHN. In June, 1878, he was appointed by the President as superintendent of the United States mint at New Orleans, which office he held until the 1st of January, 1879, remaining at his post of duty during the epidemic of 1878 and contributing his services in relieving the distress caused by that scourge upon the city.

In November, 1879, he was elected by an almost unanimous vote judge of the district composed of the parishes of Jefferson, Saint Charles, and Saint John. In 1880, during the Presidential campaign, he started and edited the New Orleans Ledger, supporting the Republican nominees. In April, 1884, he was re-elected district judge unanimously for four years. In October following he reluctantly accepted the nomination as the Republican candidate for Congress from the second district of Louisiana, only two weeks before the election, at which he received over 1,300 majority.

The mature years of MICHAEL HAHN ran parallel with the most exciting and trying period in the history of his adopted State. The political caldron of 1860 stirred the souls of the great masses from one end of the land to the other. Hard feelings were engendered; solicitudes were entertained and nurtured.

The Sage of Auburn had declared that this country must be all free or all slave. The people of the South knew well that it would never be all slave.

Mr. Lincoln was elected. His motives were pure, his sentiments were liberal, his course would doubtless have been paternal and national, but he was untried, and the minds of the South were filled with apprehension. Webster, Clay, and Benton, alas! were dead. Had they lived, their counsel, as oil poured upon the raging waters of the storm, might have brought calm. But they had been removed from our midst.

The people of the South loved their country, but the security of their equal rights seemed to be in peril. Hence the coals were easily fanned to a flame and the clash of arms succeeded.

The heart of Louisiana was with their whole country; but when the hour for decision came she stood side by side with her sister States of the South.

I recall these incidents not to revive the recollection of events which have passed into history, but merely to show how the subject of this memoir was brought into greater prominence.

It was in such a crisis that MICHAEL HAHN took his stand amid the few who at the advent of the victorious Federal commanders in New Orleans in 1862 could be received with confidence. It was but natural that General Butler should look with favor upon the small band of men of good repute who went forward in good faith to welcome his arrival.

In the prominent part taken by MICHAEL HAHN during this trying period it is worthy of remembrance and commendation that his course was never marked by unfriendly bearing to his fellow-citizens who had differed with him in opinion; that he evinced no malice, and he had none; that he never used his power to oppress or annoy when it could have been so readily done.

On the contrary, his talents and influence seem ever to have been industriously given to re-establish order and civil government, to restore prosperity, and to build up the best interests of the State in the mode he thought available. In this he was trusted far beyond what is the ordinary lot of man, and his judgment and learning lent strength to the fabric rebuilt.

He was of a kindly, courteous disposition, ever willing to extend the hand of relief and approachable by all.

When a member of Congress in 1863 he was granted permission by the President to visit the Union military prisons to look into the condition of Louisiana prisoners.

Many kindly acts of Governor HAHN to the people of Louisiana will live in their grateful remembrance, and especially one recounted, when citizens from the interior of the State were dragged upon frivolous charges before the court in New Orleans and lodged in a loathsome prison, and it became necessary in order to enlarge them to give a heavy bond, his warm heart led him to tender his name for their relief.

In his quiet country home he was looked up to with the confidence of a father. His advice was sought by all, and his decisions settled difficulties, smoothed asperities, and preserved order.

He was not permitted to retire from public life, but was compelled to accept positions of trust, and when he consented to be a candidate there was seldom opposition.

Mr. HAHN was a bachelor; was accustomed to living alone. In his solitary apartments alone he was called upon in the silent hour of night to surrender his existence. That he was ready and that he met his fate with dignity was plainly manifest from the calm and genial glow which wreathed his countenance when his prostrate form was discovered.

When I gazed for the last time upon the placid, peaceful countenance of the deceased, I was deeply impressed that the light which seemed to shine upon his forehead was but the reflex of the gentle spirit of the still small voice instilled by a mother and the heavenly spirit of all grace vouchsafed to man through the sacrifice of the Son of God, which stands ready to enter the hearts of all men who serve God with a willing mind and with a perfect heart.

The nation has done honor to itself in bearing the mortal remains of MICHAEL HAHN, in the guardian charge of his peers of both Houses of Congress, to their last resting-place amid the cypress and myrtle of his cherished home in Louisiana. They have laid him to rest in peace in the midst of relatives, friends, and neighbors, who to him were most dear and with whom the energies of his life had been identified.

As one of the colleagues of Mr. HAHN I bear testimony to the urbanity of his manners, to his firmness of purpose, and to his unswerving devotion to the interests of his constituents.

His presence here gave promise of great usefulness, and I sincerely mourn his loss.

Mr. ST. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I now move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously; and the House thereupon (at 8 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., April 17, 1886.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the board of directors of the Minneapolis Industrial Exposition, held April 12, 1886, it was unanimously voted to take steps at once to secure an exhibit from the National Government, made up of displays from the Smithsonian Institution and various Departments, Fish Commission, &c.

Hon. J. B. GILFILLAN, from this district, has been solicited to present the matter to the House, and we hope that Senator SABIN and yourself can pilot the matter safely through the Senate.

To enable the different departments to make a creditable showing it is necessary to have Congress appropriate from $10,000 to $15,000 to cover the expense. The cost is so trifling and the benefit derived by the people from these displays is so vast that there ought to be no hesitation about making the small appropriation needed.

On July 7, 1884, an act was passed appropriating $10,000 to send such a display to the Cincinnati Exposition. Mr. O'NEILL procured a similar act in favor of Saint Louis last year, and we trust you may succeed in doing as much for the Northwest.

A letter similar to the inclosed has been mailed to each of your colleagues in Congress from this State, requesting their co-operation with you, and we trust the Minnesota delegation may present a solid front in this matter. We hope it will be agreeable and convenient to you to aid the exposition in this manner, and we request that you endeavor to secure the necessary action of Congress at as early a date as possible, as it takes a long time to prepare the exhibits after they are authorized by Congress.

We will be pleased to render you any assistance we can from this end, and follow any suggestions you may make.

Mr. Charles W. Johnson, Clerk of the Senate, is an associate member of our committee, and we are certain will be glad to work with you.

Truly, yours,

WM. M. REGAN,
W. E. STEELE,
GEO. L. DALE,

I cordially concur in the above request.

Governor of Minnesota.

Hon. SAMUEL J. R. MCMILLAN,
U. S. Senator, Washington, D. C.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., April 17, 1886.

DEAR SIR: The Minneapolis Industrial Exposition has been duly incorporated under the laws of this State and has an invested capital of $500,000. A board of directors has been chosen, consisting of twenty-five representative business men, pledged to devote their time and talents to the success of the exposition this year. The capital stock has been subscribed by about two thousand three hundred citizens of Minneapolis, showing the universal interest taken in the matter here and the public character of the enterprise. An eligible site in the very heart of the city, valued at a quarter of a million dollars, has been donated to the exposition by citizens.

A date, August 23, 1886, has been fixed for the opening of the first grand industrial and educational exposition ever held in the Northwest, and the interest of not only the entire State, but of the whole northwestern section of our country, demands that it be made an unqualified success. Many unsolicited applications for space have already been received from the leading manufacturers of various parts of the country, and there is no question as to the success of the commercial part of the display. The board of directors, however, are in the highest degree ambitious to make it not only an attractive and entertaining one, but in as great a measure as possible an exhibition of substantial benefit to every visitor, whether young or old. To achieve this end, they intend to give particular attention to the art department and all displays of a specially educational nature.

We have inaugurated a movement to secure from the General Government displays from the Patent Office, Interior, War, Navy, and State Departments, and Smithsonian Institute, &c., similar to the exhibits made by these Departments in New Orleans, Cincinnati, and other expositions; and would bespeak for the movement the assistance of your influence.

The benefits derived from these displays by visitors, especially those of the rising generation, can hardly be overestimated. They give to every person who sees them an enlarged idea of the power and resources of our common country, and enable the people of the interior to form some idea of the methods by which the affairs of the various Departments of the National Government are conducted.

The citizens of the Central States have had the benefit of these valuable and instructive displays at the Cincinnati and Saint Louis expositions. Those of the Southern and Southwestern sections of the country have had an opportunity to see them at the World's Exposition in New Orleans. It is but fair and just that the Northwest, so far remote from the seat of Government, should be permitted to enjoy the same advantages. From the fact that Minneapolis is the great railroad center of this section, and also a great summer resort, and at the time of the holding of our exposition will be filled with tourists from all sections of the country, is presented as the strongest reasons why it will be just and proper for Congress to authorize the slight expenditure necessary to enable so many people to inspect these treasures of our Government.

Our honorable Representative in Congress from this district will present the matter to the House of Representatives, and the subject will be brought before the Senate by our honorable Senators.

We trust you may find it agreeable to assist them in securing this great advantage to the people of the Northwest.

We can assure you that this exposition is not local in its character, but is truly national in its scope. It will be conducted in a cosmopolitan spirit, and has already enlisted the interest of all parts of the country.

A reply at your earliest opportunity is earnestly requested.

Truly, yours,

WM. M. REGAN,
GEO. L. DALE,
JAS. McGOLRICK,
W. J. DEAN,
W. E. STEELE,
CHAS. W. JOHNSON,
Committee on Exhibits.
W. D. WASHBURN,
President.

I cordially concur in above request.

L. F. HUBBARD,
Governor of Minnesota.

Hon. S. J. R. McMILLAN,
United States Senate, Washington.

This bill is substantially the bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], which has just been indefinitely postponed. THE SHIPPING LAWS.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to say one word touching the order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Maine will proceed.

Mr. FRYE. I do not like to interfere with what seems to have been an arrangement that the Calendar shall be taken up in regular order, but I find myself obliged to be absent from Washington for an indefinite period. My consicence will not trouble me at all in relation to it provided I can have one bill disposed of before I go, and that is the House bill touching shipping fees, &c. I do not think it will take long to dispose of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the order of business?

Mr. FRYE. It is No. 267. The bill has been on the Calendar for a long while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read by sections for amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that course will be pursued.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 32, after the word "allow," to insert "and pay, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and in line 35, after the word "act," to insert "also such compensation to clerks of shipping commissioners as would have been paid them had this act not passed;" so as to read:

Collectors or other officers of customs, inspectors of steam-vessels, and shipping commissioners who are paid wholly or partly by fees shall make a detailed report of such services, and the fees provided by law, to the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations as that officer may prescribe; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow and pay, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said officers such compensation for said services as each would have received prior to the passage of this act; also such compensation to clerks of shipping commissioners as would have been paid them had this act not passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 4, after "West Indies," to insert "or that part of the coast of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That shipping commissioners may ship and discharge crews for any vessel engaged in the coastwise trade, or the trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, or Newfoundland, or the West Indies, or that part of the coast of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea, or the Republic of Mexico, at the request of the master or owner of such vessel, the shipping and discharging fees in such cases to be one-half that prescribed by section 4612 of the Revised Statutes, for the purpose of determining the compensation of shipping commissioners.

Mr. FRYE. That amendment is a mistake. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That section 10 of the act entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, be amended by inserting after the word "relative," in line 19, the following: "Or to an original creditor in liquidation of any just debt for board or clothing which he may have contracted prior to engagement, not exceeding one month's pay for board and one month's pay for clothing." And said section 10 is further amended by striking out all of the last paragraph after the words "vessels of the United States" and inserting in lieu of such words stricken out the following: "And any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated this section shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for a similar violation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 4, line 11, after the word "navigation," to strike out the words "but shall not apply to any canal-boat, barge, or lighter," and to insert "including canal-boats, barges, and lighters;" so as to make the section read:

That section 4289 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4289. The provisions of the seven preceding sections, and of section 18 of an act entitled 'An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes,' approved June 26, 1884, relating to the limitations of the liability of the owners of vessels, shall apply to all sea-going vessels, and also to all vessels used on lakes or rivers or in inland navigation, including canal-boats, barges, and lighters."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was to strike out section 7, in the following words:

SEC. 7. Every vessel of 20 tons or upward, entitled to be documented as a vessel of the United States, other than registered vessels, found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, or carrying on the fishery, without being enrolled and licensed, and every vessel of less than 20 tons and not less than 5 tons burden found trading or carrying on the fishery as aforesaid, without a license obtained as provided by this title, shall be liable to a fine of $30 at every port of arrival without such enrollment or license. But if the license shall have expired while the vessel was at sea, and there shall have been no opportunity to renew such license, then said fine of $30 shall not be incurred. And so much of section 4371 of the Revised Statutes as relates to vessels entitled to be documented as vessels of the United States is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 4, after the words "fine of," to strike out "$1" and insert "$2;" so as to make the section read:

That foreign vessels found transporting passengers between places or ports in the United States, when such passengers have been taken on board in the United States, shall be liable to a fine of $2 for every passenger landed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, after the word "six" at the end of line 1, to strike out "seven;" and in line 4, after the word "such," to insert regulations and;" so as to make the section read:

That the fines imposed by sections 5, 6, and 8 of this act shall be subject to remission or mitigation by the Secretary of the Treasury when the offense was not willfully committed, under such regulations and methods of ascertaining the facts as may seem to him advisable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 10, line 6, after "United States," to strike out the words "and to vessels of foreign countries granting similar privileges to vessels of the United States in their ports;" so as to make the section read:

That the provision of Schedule N of "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883, allowing a drawback on imported bituminous coal used for fuel on vessels propelled by steam, shall be construed to apply only to vessels of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 11, line 13, after the words "Bermuda Islands," to insert "on the coast of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea;" and after the word "ports," at the end of line 18, to insert "not, however, to include vessels in distress or not engaged in trade;" so as to read:

That section 14 of "an act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum imposed prior to July 1, 1884, a duty of 3 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 15 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West Indian Islands, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, or the coast of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea, or the Sandwich Islands, or Newfoundland; and a duty of 6 cents per ton, not to exceed 30 cents per ton per annum, is hereby imposed at each entry upon all vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any other foreign ports, not, however, to include vessels in distress or not engaged in trade."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 11, line 32, after the words "provided further," to strike out:

That any vessel arriving from a foreign port in a port of the United States in distress or not engaged in trade shall be exempt from such tonnage tax: And provided further.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 14 the following:

SEC. 14. That section 4418 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by striking out from the nineteenth and following lines thereof the words "and, to indicate the pressure of steam, suitable steam-registers that will correctly record each excess of steam carried above the prescribed limit, and the highest point attained."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 15 the following:

SEC. 15. That the provisions of sections 2510 and 2511 of the Revised Statutes and of section 16 of "an act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, shall apply to the construction, equipment, repairs, and supplies of vessels of the United States employed in the fisheries or in the whaling business, in the same manner as to vessels of the United States engaged in the foreign trade.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer an amendment, but I shall withhold it, in order that the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] may offer an amendment which would more properly come in first.

Mr. MILLER. My amendment would more properly come in at the present time than follow the amendment of the Senator from Maine. I move to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That rule 12 of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes shall be so construed as not to require row-boats and skiffs upon the river St. Lawrence to carry lights.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. From the Committee on Commerce I move to add a new section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. That whenever any foreign country whose vessels have been placed on the same footing in the ports of the United States as American vessels (the coastwise trade excepted) shall deny to any vessels of the United States any of the commercial privileges accorded to national vessels in the harbors, ports, or waters of such foreign country, the President, on receiving satisfactory information of the continuance of such discriminations against any vessels of the United States, is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation excluding, on and after such time as he may indicate, from the exercise of such commercial privileges in the ports of the United States as are denied to American vessels in the ports of such foreign countries, all vessels of such foreign country of a similar character to the vessels of the United States thus discriminated against, and suspending the concessions previously granted to the vessels of such country; and on and after the date named in such proclamation for it to take effect, if the master, officer, or agent of any vessel of such foreign country excluded by said proclamation from the exercise of any commercial privileges shall do any act prohibited by said proclamation in the ports, harbors, or waters of the United States for or on account of such vessel, such vessel, and its rigging, tackle, furniture, and boats, and all the goods on board, shall be liable to seizure and to forfeiture to the United States; and any person opposing any officer of the United States in the enforcement of this act, or aiding and abetting any other person in such opposition, shall forfeit $800, and shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I inquire of the Senator who has charge of the bill if this amendment is reported by the committee?

Mr. FRYE. It is reported by the committee.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is it in print?

Mr. FRYE. It is.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is a very important amendment and has not come under my notice before.

Mr. FRYE. It was reported about a week ago by the Committee on Commerce unanimously.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator be so kind, when the proper time arrives, to explain it?

Mr. FRYE. No time is any more proper than now.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Very well. I have only heard it hurriedly read at the desk, and therefore can not exactly understand the full purport of the amendment.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Maine allow me? My understanding was when this amendment was proposed in committee that the Senator from Maine was to confer with the State Department in regard to it. I have heard nothing with reference to the matter since. I should like to hear from the Senator from Maine what the Secretary of State says in regard to this amendment. I see in the proceedings of the House of Representatives that a resolution has been adopted calling upon the State Department to explain the status of this matter at present.

Mr. FRYE. I was to call on the State Department the next morning, but unexpectedly to me the Committee on Commerce was called together the next morning on the river and harbor bill. I was obliged to be present there, and therefore did not see the Secretary of State. I submitted the question to the committee whether I must see him before the amendment was reported, and it was unanimously agreed that I need not. As the matter was pretty thoroughly understood and there seemed to be no special necessity for doing so I did not see him, and have not.

Mr. VEST. I was not present in the committee at the last meeting.

Mr. FRYE. I hardly know what explanation to give about this, and I do not wish to occupy any more time than is absolutely necessary. I learned long ago not to discuss a bill if I wanted to pass it.

It was stated in the discussion on the fishery resolution some time since that there was a statute which authorized the President of the United States to suspend intercourse with Canada or any other foreign country in case necessity arose for doing it. On examining that statute I found that it was not so; that it had no application to the condition of things which now exists in Canada, and therefore I had referred to the Committee on Commerce a general bill giving the President, not authority in a special case, not naming Canada, or England, or any other country, but a general bill authorizing the President, where discriminations were made and ports were closed against United States vessels by any country, if in his judgment it was deemed advisable, after notice given, to issue a proclamation closing our ports against the same vessels of that country.

I do not see myself the slightest earthly objection to it. I do not see that the Secretary of State could possibly object to it. I made it the duty of the President, but the Committee on Commerce amended that by simply giving the President the right to do it if he pleased, leaving it entirely to his judgment. It seems to me a very important law to have on the statute-book, as Congress is not always in session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I was detained from the Senate by illness at the time the bill was passed upon in committee. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine why section 14, which strikes out certain lines of section 4418 of the Revised Statutes, was inserted:

SEC. 14. That section 4418 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by striking out from the nineteenth and following lines thereof the words "and, to indicate the pressure of steam, suitable steam-registers that will correctly record each excess of steam carried above the prescribed limit, and the highest point attained."

Mr. FRYE. That was undoubtedly one of those requirements of law in the interest of a patent. The supervising inspector of steamships addressed a letter to us, in which he called our attention to it and said that the thing itself was utterly useless, it could not be of any benefit, and was of large cost, and that in his opinion the law ought to be repealed which required it; and it was repealed on the strength of the supervising inspector's request.

I have one other amendment which I desire to offer as a new section. The old law with regard to destitute seamen left in foreign ports required our vessels to bring them home, being paid for a certain distance $10 and a certain other distance $20. That was when only sailing vessels were in use; and while it was not a reasonable sum to pay those vessels for a long voyage, yet as sailing vessels can almost always make use of an extra man it was supposed that they would get extra labor enough out of these sailors sent home to make it reasonable pay.

The last shipping act, the act of 1884, increased that limit to $20 and $35, but it is found nowadays wherever you have a line of steamers that the American consuls and the sailors themselves who are left insist on being carried home in the steamer; but the steamer never has any use for an extra hand. A steamer is obliged to take hands enough on board to be occupied at landings and all that sort of thing, but it always has extra hands when at sea, and a large number of extra hands; so that when the Government puts a destitute sailor or stranded sailor in a foreign port on a steamship he is a charge to the steamship entirely.

Now, take the line to Brazil. There were carried about forty-two men a distance averaging over 4,000 miles each. The amount under the act which the Government was authorized to pay the steamship company for carrying those men was $35 apiece. The Government pay amounted to $1,190. The actual cost to the steamship company for doing that service was over $3,000, for which it received $1,190. The steerage passage of those seamen would have amounted to $6,065; so that the loss to the steamship company was $4,875. In all respects they were treated precisely the same as steerage passengers—no work, and nothing for them to do on earth.

Of course these sailors prefer to be sent home by a steam line, and undoubtedly a great many men who are not sailors manage through some dishonest consul to get a certificate and are sent home on a steamer. To remedy this very grave injustice I offer the following amendment, to be inserted as a new section:

SEC. —. Section 9 of "an act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, is hereby amended in the eighth line by inserting after the words "consular officer" the following: "When the transportation is by a sailing vessel; and the regular steerage-passenger rate, when not exceeding 2 cents per mile, when the transportation is by steamer;" and the third section is further amended by adding at the end the following: "Or to take any seaman having a contagious disease."

That retains the old price where they are sent by sailing vessels, as the law undoubtedly expected they would be sent, and increases the price to the steerage rate where sent by a steamer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD the statement to which I have referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

Distressed United States citizens (paupers) placed on board United States and British mail steamship companies' steamers by United States consuls, and carried, fed, and housed in all respects same as steerage passengers.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the last section, wherein it is provided:

That the provisions of sections 2510 and 2511 of the Revised Statutes——

I turned to the editions of the Revised Statutes with a view to see what those sections were, and I find in the edition of 1878 that section 2510 relates to "machinery for manufacture of beet sugar;" and I find in looking further back to the edition of 1873–'75 that sections 2510 and 2511 are the sections intended probably to be referred to by this section of the bill.

It seems to me that is rather an indefinite reference to those statutes, because the revised edition of 1878 seems to be the lawful edition now of the Revised Statutes, made so by proclamation of the Secretary of State.

Mr. FRYE. The last edition is clearly a mistake, but the statement of the sections is right in the bill as I have it here, but perhaps that had better be looked to. How would the Senator suggest that the section be amended?

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that the reference to the title ought to identify the subject.

Mr. FRYE. The title is the same in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. In the revision of tariff act "duties on imports" in one edition I find sections 2510 and 2511, and in the other edition they are sections 2513 and 2514. You might say "edition of 1873." That would cover it.

Mr. FRYE. I think myself that it is certain now, although I got into trouble when I hunted the matter up. The last edition was wrong. I move to amend, in section 15, so as to make it read:

That the provisions of sections 2510 and 2511 of the Revised Statutes of the edition of 1873, &c.

Mr. ALLISON. We had better say 1875. It seems to have been proclaimed in 1875.

Mr. FRYE. Very well, say "edition of 1875."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to insert the words "edition of 1875."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine what change is made in the tonnage tax?

Mr. FRYE. The tonnage tax stands precisely as it did before, but complications arose by reason of certain foreign countries repealing certain dues, and complaining that they were not treated so favorably as those countries which were contiguous, and the law has been changed, so that now in a country that retains its dues taking the place of tonnage dues, the President by proclamation may extend the repeal of these dues to that country.

Mr. SEWELL. Making it a reciprocal law?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir; we make it a reciprocal law.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Maine the meaning of section 13, which provides that the provisions of section 11 of "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying-trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, shall not be construed to apply to whaling vessels.

Mr. FRYE. The requirement referred to in that section is the slop-chest. Whalers all sail upon contract, the men and officers sharing with the owners, and they prefer very much to take care of their own outfit. The provision was inserted at their request.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and, by unanimous consent, the President pro tempore appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MILLER, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

Order of Business 162, being the bill (S. 1286) to amend section 604 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes, was announced as in order.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President, there is a bill on the Calendar, Senate bill No. 2115, being Order of Business 981, granting to the Oregonian Railway Bridge Company of Oregon the right to construct a bridge over the Willamette River in the vicinity of Ray's Landing, Oregon.

The bill is reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce, and the company stands ready to construct the bridge. It is a local matter. The company is delayed proceeding with the construction of the bridge simply awaiting the passage of this bill. Under these circumstances I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow the bill to pass at this time. It will require only the reading of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. The object I have in view in desiring the Calendar to be proceeded with is that we may reach a good many such bills which are on the Calendar. There are two or three bills in which my constituents are interested where there seems to be an absolute necessity for action by the Senate. I hope we shall devote the morning hour to bills on the Calendar. I have not asked the consideration of special bills, and must object to the consideration of others. I did not object in the case of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] because the Senator was going away.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill can not be considered at this time.

Mr. CONGER. Are bills to be taken up on the Calendar that have been passed over heretofore without prejudice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those passed over without prejudice are usually not taken up without being called for. Those passed over without prejudice can be called up on motion.

Mr. CONGER. The first bill on the Calendar that has been called up is one that was passed over, and several have been passed over without prejudice. Should not the Calendar be taken up where we left off the call, and let these others be called up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the course which is being taken. The first case on the Calendar under that ruling will be stated.

JURIES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

The bill (S. 12) to authorize the juries of the United States circuit and district courts to be used interchangeably, and to provide for drawing talesmen, was announced as in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, line 6, after the words "shall be," to strike out "in session" and insert "held;" and in line 8, after the word "if," to strike out the words "possible and;" so as to make the section read:

That the act of Congress approved June 30, 1879, chapter 52, section 2, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that whenever any circuit and district courts of the United States shall be held at the same time and place they shall be authorized and required, if the business of the courts will permit, to use interchangeably the juries in either court drawn according to the provisions of said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That in order to avoid delay in the business of the courts, it shall be lawful, in drawing names from the jury-boxes as tales-jurors, for the court to excuse those drawn who live at a distance from the court until names of persons living within a convenient distance are drawn; or the court may direct the clerks and commissioners to provide a box, as those now authorized by law are made up, containing not less than three hundred names of persons residing near the place where the court is held, and qualified to serve as jurors, from which the court may direct to be drawn the tales-jurors required to fill vacancies on the regular panel; or the court may, in an emergency, authorize bystanders to be summoned to fill vacancies on the jury: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the courts to draw the regular juries otherwise than in the mode prescribed by the act of June 30, 1879.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

Mr. COKE. I desire to give notice that to-morrow after the morning hour I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to lay aside the pending order and take up Order of Business 553, being the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide a method for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés, for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon.

CALIFORNIA SCHOOL LANDS.

The bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "lands," to insert "within the State of California and from lands;" so as to make the section read:

That the State of California shall have the right to select for school purposes other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections as may have been or shall be found to be mineral lands: Provided, That such selections shall be made from lands within the State of California, and from lands returned as agricultural, and upon which at the date of selection no valuable mineral discoveries have been made; and all such selections shall be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall, if he is satisfied such lands so selected are not mineral, so certify, and thereupon the right of said State to such selected lands shall finally attach; and the Secretary of the Interior shall also ascertain whether any of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections are mineral lands, and shall certify their character, which certificate shall determine the matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Section 3 ought to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa move to strike out section 3?

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

It is utterly unnecessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALIFORNIA LAND SALES.

The bill (S. 994) granting to the State of California 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of lands in said State was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. DOLPH. I believe the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] desires it to keep its place on the Calendar without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa object to its retaining its place on the Calendar?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

ISAIAH W. LEES AND H. H. ELLIS.

Mr. FAIR. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 666, being the bill (S. 2135) to compensate Isaiah W. Lees and H. H. Ellis, of San Francisco, for services rendered the Government.

Mr. CONGER. We are progressing toward that bill very rapidly now if nobody interferes, and I hope we may go at full speed without interruption. I want to get at some bills on the Calendar in their order.

Mr. FAIR. I am very sorry for the objection. I am only carrying out a request of Mr. MILLER, our late associate, now dead.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill can not be taken up now.

Mr. FAIR. Will not the Senator from Michigan withdraw his objection?

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator states that he asks for the consideration of the bill at the request of our former colleague, Mr. MILLER, I feel unwilling to make objection, if it was a measure in which he was interested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 666, being the bill (S. 2135) to compensate Isaiah W. Lees and H. H. Ellis, of San Francisco, for services rendered the Government.

Mr. CONGER. If it will not lead to debate I shall not object.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

Mr ALLISON. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. FAIR April 14, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1963) to compensate Isaiah W. Lees and H. H. Ellis, of San Francisco, Cal., for services rendered the Government, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

It appears that the late Senator MILLER, of California, was immediately connected with the direction of the service performed by these claimants for which compensation is asked in the bill.

His opinion of the value of their labor, as well as his manifest desire to aid them in obtaining remuneration therefor, is clearly shown by the following affidavit and letter.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

John F. Miller, being duly sworn, says that he read the petition of H. H. Ellis and I. W. Lees, and that the statement of facts therein contained is substantially true; that the frauds upon the United States revenues mentioned in said statement were detected and brought to light by the efforts of said Ellis and Lees, and that the payments mentioned in said statement were made by way of a compromise between the United States and Charles S. Lord, and the same was sanctioned by the Treasury Department; that the confessions of judgment in the actions brought upon the export bonds given by said Lord were mere incidents to said compromise, and the money was paid in settlement of all matters of difference between the revenue department and said Lord; that affiant was, at the time of all the transactions mentioned in said statement, collector of customs for the district of San Francisco, and made said compromises on the part of the United States; that affiant expected that said Ellis and Lees would receive one-fourth part of said sum, being the parties who gave the information which led to the payment of said moneys into the Treasury of the United States, and so represented to them; that the detection of the said frauds were, as affiant verily believes, of great benefit to the United States, and that the compensation requested by said Ellis and Lees is justly due them; and further saith not.

[SEAL.] JOHN F. MILLER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1870.

GENTLEMEN: Your note of the 21st ultimo and copies of your memorial to Congress have been received.

It will afford me pleasure to render you all the aid in my power. Your memorial is well prepared and correctly states the facts and circumstances of the case. If a bill is introduced for your relief I will cheerfully go before the Committee on Claims and give my testimony, which will substantiate all you have said in the memorial.

Very truly, yours,

JNO. F. MILLER.

Messrs. LEES and ELLIS,
San Francisco.

The accompanying affidavits also appear in the proof:

I hereby certify that I was United States attorney for the district of California during the time referred to, and I fully concur with General Miller in his statement in regard to the services rendered by Messrs. Lees and Ellis, and that they ought to be liberally compensated therefor.

[SEAL.] DELOS LAKE,
Judge of the Municipal Criminal Court, San Francisco.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

I hereby certify that during the time the alleged frauds were committed on the revenue of the United States Government said Lees was a captain of police and said Ellis policeman, both belonging to what is known as the detective branch of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, and who were specially detailed at said time to investigate into said frauds and aid in the discovery thereof by and at the request of General John F. Miller, the collector of the port of San Francisco at that time.

[SEAL.] P. CROWLEY, Chief of Police.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

Thomas B. Shannon, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he was surveyor of the port of San Francisco during the years of 1867-'68; that detective officers Lees and Ellis discovered the frauds practiced on the Government by the firm of Nudd, Lord, and others, and the sales and compromises resulting directly from their seizures amounted to $43,415.84, cash.

That they had never been paid their moiety on this or any other sum up to the present time, and are justly entitled to a liberal compensation, for the effect of their labors utterly destroyed the most formidable whisky combination that ever existed on this coast.

[NOTARIAL SEAL.] THOS. B. SHANNON.

A letter from ex-Mayor Bryant, of San Francisco, to Hon. BARCLAY HENLEY, of the House of Representatives, contains the following statement:

"I was naval officer of this port at the time of the detection of frauds on the revenues which resulted in the seizure at different times of goods and property belonging to the firm of Nudd, Lord & Co., and their associates.

"The United States Government received from the seizures, sales, and compromises over $43,000, but this sum was unimportant compared with the revenues accruing to the Government through the prompt destruction of that 'ring.'"

"Messrs. Lees and Ellis, of the San Francisco detective force, were the sole persons who accomplished the great work."

On account of the sickness of the late Senator MILLER, a bill for the relief of these claimants was not introduced in the Senate until after his decease.

On the 18th day of January last, Mr. MORROW, of California, introduced in the House of Representatives a bill (H. R. 3864) containing the same words and figures, which was referred to the Committee on Claims in that body.

On the 11th day of March it was favorably reported from that committee with an amendment.

That report presents a full and concise statement of the case as exhibited by the proofs, and is herewith appended and made a part of this report, as follows:

"The claimants mentioned in the bill were members of the detective arm of the San Francisco police department during the years 1867-'68, and were employed by Senator MILLER, of California, who was at that time the collector of customs of the port of San Francisco, to work up certain suspicious circumstances connected with the management of local internal-revenue affairs.

"The result of their skill and labor brought to light the existence of a systematic method by which distilled spirits were removed from the internal-revenue bonded warehouses for the alleged purpose of rectification; the packages thus removed were filled with water and returned to the warehouse, while their original contents were placed upon the local market and sold without paying the tax due thereon.

"To perfect the scheme, and place its detection beyond the reasonable possibility of exposure, they exported the barrels containing the water so fraudulently substituted to foreign countries, under custom-house export bonds. Upon presentation of landing certificates from the American consul at the port of destination the job was finally concluded.

"The incident which unveiled the peculiar methods adopted to evade the lawful tax came to light through the failure of a captain of a vessel in the employ of Nudd, Lord & Co., a heavy wholesale liquor house, to successfully execute one of their plans.

"It appears that on the 9th day of July, 1867, the schooner Sarah cleared in the San Francisco custom-house for the Amoor River, laden with 175 barrels and 100 cases of spirits, properly protected by an export bond for $64,800, which represented double the amount of the tax due thereon had it entered into local consumption. A few days thereafter she was reported wrecked off Santa Cruz, which is located about 75 miles south of the harbor of San Francisco.

"It was at this time that Senator MILLER secured the services of these officers. They discovered the wreck, and found evidence that she had been intentionally scuttled; that the hoops on the barrels were purposely cut to permit the contents to escape, and a few of the barrels that had not been cut contained water only. With this information they proceeded to arrest the cook of the schooner, whom they found concealed on board a vessel lying in the harbor of San Francisco, and imprisoned him. While under arrest, through the payment of money and promise of exemption from criminal prosecution, they obtained information by which they found concealed in a cave in Sir Francis Drake's Bay, located on the coast of California, about 40 miles north of San Francisco, 24 barrels and 100 cases of genuine spirits, part of the schooner Sarah's alleged cargo.

"The remainder of the crew were subsequently arrested and indicted.

"It also appears in the evidence that the same firm of Nudd, Lord & Co., in the month of May previous, had shipped forty-three barrels of alleged spirits to Victoria, British Columbia. Further investigation proved that forty contained water and three only contained spirits.

"In the same month they had shipped one hundred barrels of alleged spirits to Guaymas, Mexico. This shipment turned out to be ninety barrels of water and ten only of spirits, which were sold at that place.

"The proofs furnished the committee are documentary, and found in House Executive Documents, first session Forty-first Congress. They are embraced in the report of ex-Governor Samuel Purdy, who was detailed as special agent of the internal revenue at Washington to proceed to San Francisco and investigate the internal-revenue affairs, which had now become the subject of much newspaper excitement.

"The proofs show that the sums collected from the seizures and information furnished Senator MILLER by these claimants were as follows:

From the sale of the spirits found at Drake's Bay	$2,370 80
From sale of the wreck of the schooner Sarah	845 04
From the export bond of the schooner Sarah	32,400 00
From the export bond of the steamer Active	7,800 00

"The total net sum paid into the National Treasury through the efforts of the claimants aggregates $43,415.84, and they ask for one-half of that amount, namely, $21,707.92, as compensation due them for services rendered, or moieties due to 'informers' under section 179 of the old internal-revenue laws.

"From the historical facts set forth in the report of ex-Governor Purdy, and the unimpeachable character of the gentlemen signing the letters, as well as the accompanying affidavits, your committee find no hesitation whatever in concluding that these claimants are entitled to a just compensation for services rendered.

"Had each of these cases been tried before the court and judgment duly rendered for those amounts respectively, it is probable that, upon a proper representation, the United States district judge might have ordered at that time that these claimants be declared the "informers" according to law, and awarded them one-half of the net sums collected through their instrumentality. But no such action was had, and a further discussion of that phase of the case does not properly enter into the present consideration.

"It is conclusively shown by the affidavit of Senator MILLER, of California, who was at that time the collector of customs for the port of San Francisco, that when he employed these claimants he represented to them that they would receive one-fourth part of the net sum accruing to the Government from the success of their labors.

"This representation was based upon section 3090 United States Revised Statutes, page 183, and is the law to-day as well as then. That section, after stating what disposition shall be made of the fines, forfeitures, or penalties incurred under the act by first paying the duties, costs, &c., says:

"'And the residue of the proceeds aforesaid shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and distributed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury in the manner following, to wit: One-half to the United States; one-fourth to the person giving the information which led to the seizure or the recovery of the fine or penalty,' &c.

"It was under the authority conferred by the foregoing section that Senator MILLER offered these gentlemen employment and received their services. The subsequent transfer of the different civil and criminal proceedings then pending to the courts for final adjudication through the internal-revenue arm of the Government did not, in the opinion of your committee, change the status of the original contract and understanding with Collector Miller.

"It is clearly shown in the proofs that each case was compromised by Senator MILLER as collector of customs; that the money was paid to him, and by him personally covered into the national Treasury without reference to the Internal Revenue Office. The confessions of judgment before the courts were merely incidental; they were doubtless resorted to by the defendants as being the more expeditious way to terminate the discomfiture and expense attendant upon such a complete exposure of bold and questionable transactions.

"Your committee therefore report the bill with the following amendment, namely: In lieu of the words 'twenty-one thousand seven hundred and seven dollars and seventy-two cents' insert the words 'ten thousand eight hundred and fifty-three dollars and eighty-six cents.'

"The last-named sum represents one-fourth of the net amount collected and paid into the national Treasury growing out of the efforts of the claimants, and which they are equitably entitled to under the provisions of section 3090 of the United States Revised Statutes before mentioned.

"With this amendment, we recommend the passage of the bill."

Your committee therefore report the bill back to the Senate with the recommendation that a bill the same as reported from the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives be adopted as a substitute for Senate bill No. 1693, and that Senate bill 1693 be indefinitely postponed.

In deference to the manifest wish of our late brother Senator, we recommend the early consideration and passage of the accompanying substitute bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. VOORHEES. I presume there will be no objection to my calling attention to the fact that Order of Business 238, being Senate bill 61, relates to the same subject as a bill which came from the House and has been passed, for the erection of a new library building. I therefore ask that that bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill referred to, being the bill (S. 61) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library, will be indefinitely postponed. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

ACQUIREMENT OF PROPERTY BY ALIENS.

The bill (S. 188) to prevent the acquisition of real property by aliens, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman who reported that bill has no objection, I think it had better go over without prejudice.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to have it retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

KANSAS CITY, FORT SCOTT AND GULF RAILROAD COMPANY.

The joint resolution (S. R. 18) for the relief of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, successors to the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, has, under and in accordance with the provisions of "An act to secure the rights of settlers upon certain railroad lands, and to repeal the first five sections of an act entitled 'An act granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad and its extension to Red River,' approved July 25, 1826," restored to the United States all the unsold lands received by it under its land grant, and paid into the Treasury the proceeds of all lands sold.

The resolution therefore declares the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company entitled to the payment in full of all compensation earned heretofore in transporting mails and military and other supplies for the Government, to the same extent and effect as though no lands had been granted for the benefit of the company.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. PLUMB. I can state the purport of the measure, which has heretofore passed the Senate twice, and perhaps three times.

The company named in this bill was some time in July, 1866, granted lands for the purpose of enabling it to complete its road. Subsequently, by the authority of an act of Congress, passed in 1876 I think, it was authorized to reconvey the land to the United States, which it did, and paid back to the United States all the money that it had received for the land which had been sold, divesting itself entirely of all benefit growing out of the original land grant. Meanwhile, however, before it had done this, it had transported certain supplies for the United States Government. Under and by reason of the fact that it was a land-grant railroad pay for such transportation has been withheld. As it restored to the Government all that it received before the grant went into effect, it is proposed to put the company and the Government back in their original position.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is all right. I do not care for the reading of the report.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

BILLS ADVERSELY REPORTED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Where bills are reported adversely, if there be no objection the Chair will pass them to the Calendar under the ninth rule. So that the next bill on the Calendar, being the bill (S. 510) for the relief of Sophia B. Moore, will be placed on the Calendar under the ninth rule.

JAMES S. CLARK & CO.

The bill (S. 41) for the relief of James S. Clark & Co., was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that that bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar. I think I will offer a substitute for it when it comes up again after the meeting of the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

JAMES BAINTER.

The bill (S. 145) for the relief of James Bainter, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This, being an adverse report, will be placed on the Calendar under Rule IX, and also the next four cases.

COMMANDER JOHN W. PHILIP.

The bill (S. 1568) to authorize Commander John W. Philip, United States Navy, to accept a silver pitcher tendered him by the Government of the United States of Colombia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY F. POTTS.

The bill (S. 244) for the relief of Mary F. Potts was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that go over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

MICHAEL J. HEWSTON.

The bill (S. 329) to increase the pension of Michael J. Hewston was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill, being reported adversely, it will be placed on the Calendar under Rule IX.

TICE METERS.

The bill (S. 950) to authorize suits to be brought in the Court of Claims for money paid and expenses incurred on account of Tice meters, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is adversely reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar under Rule IX.

DISTRICT TAX SALES.

The bill (S. 634) relating to sales for taxes in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator reporting that bill is not present. I ask that it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

DISTRICT LIQUOR SALES.

The bill (S. 1380) relating to the sale of distilled and fermented liquors in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. That was also reported by the Senator from Kansas, who is not present. Let it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

LOUISE HOME PROPERTY.

The bill (S. 1129) to exempt from taxation all property held by the trustees of the Louise Home, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, striking out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof inserting:

That all property held as endowment fund by the trustees of the Louise Home, in the city of Washington, D. C., for the purpose of revenue to support said institution, shall be, and the same is hereby, declared exempt from all taxation and assessments by the municipal authorities or by the United States so long as the same shall be so held; and all taxes and assessments made or imposed upon any of the property of said trustees subsequent to the 21st day of November, 1869, whether real, personal, or mixed, be, and the same are hereby, released: Provided, That real estate heretofore purchased by said trustees in the management of the endowment fund shall be exempt from taxation only while so held, and not to exceed five years from the passage of this act.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. MILLER. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I appeal to the Senator from New York to allow the report to be read. It simply releases from taxation the endowment fund of the charity established by Mr. Corcoran known as the Louise Home. The endowment fund has been assessed and taxes are claimed on it.

Mr. MILLER. If I understand the measure, it not only relieves the property they may now have but all they may hereafter have; and if these funds are invested in real estate in the city, in houses which are rented or in stores or in manufacturing establishments or in any other property, under the provisions of this bill they are entirely exempted from local taxation.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will look at the bill and report he will find that a part of the endowment fund was loaned out upon mortgage security on certain real estate, and the trustees were compelled to acquire the property to secure that portion of the endowment fund. The bill does release the taxes upon that property while so held, but they are required to dispose of it within a limited time and not to hold it free from taxation.

Mr. ALLISON. This settles a very important principle if adopted, because of course it would be inequitable to apply these provisions to one charity without applying them to all, and I think it a matter of so much importance that it ought not to be considered in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that it be allowed to hold its place on the Calendar, because when Senators look at it I am satisfied they will not object to it.

Mr. MILLER. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

The bill (S. 1130) to exempt from taxation all property held by the trustees of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. That presents exactly the same question in respect to another charity.

Mr. CONGER. Let that go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the order.

BONDS OF EXECUTORS.

The bill (S. 1422) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that whenever hereafter a testator shall, by last will and testament, request that his executor or executors be not required to give bond for the performance of his or their duty as such executor or executors, then and in such case the bond required shall be in such penalty as the court may consider sufficient to secure the payment of the debts due by the testator. The penalty of this bond may be increased, or an additional bond required, whenever it shall be made to appear to the court that the bond as given is insufficient to secure the payment of the debts of the testator; and on application of any distributee or legatee entitled to take under the will, the court shall require the executor to give additional bond, with security in penalty sufficient to secure the interest of such distributee or legatee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to invite the attention of the Chair to a bill which has just been passed over, the bill (S. 371) limiting a portion of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes." I was out of the Senate Chamber temporarily. I should be glad to have that bill retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been done on account of the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The bill (S. 984) to regulate the foreclosure of mortgages and deeds of trust in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that bill. I see the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] is absent, and there is no printed report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1598) to annex a certain strip of land therein named to the Territory of New Mexico was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes to the Calendar under Rule IX.

MARTIN L. BUNDY.

The bill (S. 365) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the settlement of the accounts of Martin L. Bundy, late a paymaster in the Army, the proper accounting officers shall allow $719.47 for the forage of two horses, to which he was entitled, and which was not drawn by him, from the 17th of July, 1862, to the 15th of April, 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMS ACCOUNT OF MONTANA.

The bill (S. 129) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms, ammunition, and accouterments between the Territory of Montana and the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REAR-ADMIRAL NICHOLSON.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. 48) authorizing Rear-Admiral J. W. A. Nicholson to accept a medal conferred upon him by the King of Sweden and Norway.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there any report in that case?

Mr. FRYE. Perhaps that had better stand over, as the Senator reporting it is absent.

Several SENATORS. There is a report. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, presented the following, to accompany S. R. 48:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 9, 1886.

SIR: At the instance of the Secretary of the Navy, I have the honor to invite the action of Congress on the request of Rear-Admiral J. W. A. Nicholson, United States Navy, retired, to be authorized to accept from the King of Sweden and Norway a gold medal with an inscription thanking him for services to the consul-general of his government in Egypt during the bombardment of Alexandria in July, 1882.

Reference is made to S. R. 39, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, &c.,
Committee on Foreign Relations, Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 8, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the information and consideration of your committee a copy of a letter to this Department from the Secretary of the Navy, in regard to certain decorations and presents therein described which have been tendered to officers of the Navy by foreign governments and deposited in this Department pursuant to the provisions of the third section of the act of Congress, approved January 31, 1881.

I respectfully recommend that permission be granted to the several officers named in Mr. Chandler's letter to accept the presents and decorations which have been tendered to them, respectively, subject to the provisions of the second section of the above-mentioned act of Congress.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Hon. JOHN F. MILLER,
Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Senate.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, October 10, 1883.

SIR: Referring to the letters of the Department of State, dated January 4, 10, and 11, April 3 and September 13, 1883, with regard to certain decorations and presents tendered officers of the United States Navy by foreign governments, I beg leave to inclose herewith a list of the officers upon whom presents or decorations have been conferred, and to ask that such steps may be taken as may seem to you expedient for obtaining the authority of Congress for their acceptance by the officers named.

I have, &c.,

WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. FREDERICK T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Secretary of State.

List of officers of the United States Navy who have been tendered decorations or presents by foreign governments.

Rear-Admiral J. W. A. Nicholson.—A gold medal, presented by the King of Sweden for kindness and attention shown to Swedish subjects during the bombardment of Alexandria, Egypt, by the British.

Rear-Admiral R. W. Shufeldt.—A sword, Persian carpet, and other articles, presented by the Sultan of Zanzibar, during cruise of the Ticonderoga; presentation made after the custom of Oriental princes.

Rear-Admiral C. H. Baldwin.—A gold box, with a portrait of the Emperor of Russia set in diamonds, presented by the emperor on the occasion of his coronation at Moscow.

Capt. George E. Belknap.—Decoration of Knight Commander of the Royal Order of Kamehameha I, tendered by the King of the Hawaiian Islands, in recognition of his services in restoring order upon the occasion of a riot at Honolulu.

Capt. Henry Wilson and Commander Frederick Pearson.—Decorations of Knight Commander of the Royal Order of Kalakaua, tendered by the King of the Hawaiian Islands upon the occasion of his coronation.

Lieut. Charles A. Foster and Lieut. Jesse M. Roper.—Decorations of Knight Companion of the Royal Order of the Crown of Hawaii, tendered by the King of the Hawaiian Islands on the occasion of his coronation.

Commander P. H. Cooper, Lieut. Commander E. T. Strong and Lieut. T. T. Wood.—Decorations of the Order of El Busto del Libertador, tendered by his Excellency the President of Venezuela on the occasion of their visit to Caracas.

Rear-Admiral George H. Cooper, Capt. R. F. Bradford, Lieut. B. F. Tilley, Lieut. W. S. Cowles, and Ensign R. T. Milligan.—Decorations of the Order of El Busto del Libertador, tendered by His Excellency the President of Venezuela upon the occasion of the unveiling of the statue of Washington at Caracas.

Mr. LOGAN. That resolution had better go over, I guess.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that it might as well go through, if the Senator has no special objection.

Mr. FRYE. This is a case where services were actually rendered, and the medal has been in the Department for several years.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not think any injury to the public service can result from allowing an officer to receive a compliment, equivalent to a tender of thanks, from the King of Sweden as an act of national courtesy. I hope we shall not be too severe in these matters.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want to be severe about these things. I object generally to the acceptance of medals from any foreign government by any of our officers. I always have opposed it and always shall vote against it. If the Senate wants to pass the resolution, it can do it without any objection exeept my own personal objection, which I enter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand the Senator to object.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not object to its consideration, but I object myself to it and shall vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question then.

The joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. K. BELDING.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 127) for the relief of H. K. Belding, which proposes to pay $1,566 to H. K. Belding, of Minnesota, the amount due him for carrying the mails of the United States between the years 1858 and 1862.

Mr. ALLISON. I see the committee report—

They therefore recommend the payment to Mr. Belding of the sum of $850 for the seventeen months of service as above stated.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the bill stand over to be taken up when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] returns to his seat, as he is absent at this moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be passed over.

FRANK DELLA TERRE AND SUSAN F. DELLA TERRE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 492) for the relief of Frank Della Terre and Susan F. Della Terre, heirs of Peter Della Terre, deceased.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "of," where it occurs the second time, strike out "fifty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That out of any money in the Treasury of the United States the Secretary pay to Frank Della Terre and Susan F. Della Terre, heirs of the late district attorney of the northern district of California, Peter Della Terre, deceased, the sum of $10,000, in full consideration for extraordinary services rendered by said Peter Della Terre, during the years 1857, 1858, and 1859, in defending the title of the United States to public property in the State of California, and recovery of 19,148 square miles of territory, valued at $150,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. Where is the report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a long report.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not care whether it is long or short; I want to know what the claim is.

Mr. DOLPH. As that report is very lengthy and will occupy the entire morning hour and may lead to some discussion, I ask that the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, and when the Calendar is taken up to-morrow morning I shall have the papers ready and be prepared to answer any question about the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over informally.

WILLIAM TABB.

The bill (S. 1310) for the relief of William Tabb was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William Tabb, of Spottsylvania County, near Fredericksburg, Va., $2,149.75, in full for supplies taken from him during the years 1863 and 1864 by and for the use of the United States troops.

Mr. HOAR. There is a very brief report in that case which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HOAR February 24, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1310) for the relief of William Tabb, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

We adopt the report made by Mr. HOAR from this committee in the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, and recommend the passage of the bill:

This is a claim for property alleged to have been taken from the claimant, in part in May, 1863, by forces under the command of General Joseph Hooker, and in part in May, 1864, by forces under command of Maj. Gen. U. S. Grant. It appears from the evidence on file that the claimant was born in England; that he came to this country in 1848, and has since resided in Spottsylvania County, Virginia; that in 1856 he declared in one of the courts in said State his intention to become a citizen of the United States and to renounce all allegiance to foreign powers in the manner prescribed by law; that in 1870 he took his final oath and received his naturalization papers.

On the 16th of September, 1872 he presented his claim to the Southern Claims Commission. The reports of that commission show that the claim was never prosecuted before them. The claimant alleges that he did not prosecute his claim before that commission because informed by his counsel, after having presented his claim, that the commission had said that they would not take jurisdiction of the cause, owing to the fact that the claimant was not, at the time of the taking of the property, a citizen of the United States. The claimant further alleges that his counsel informed him that the commission advised a petition to Congress.

Upon this state of facts the claimant made a petition to Congress in 1874, that being two years after he had filed his petition before the Southern Claims Commission.

There seems to be no doubt as to the claimant's loyalty, it being established by the testimony of several witnesses, including his neighbors and Union soldiers. Your committee are of the opinion that, so far as the character of the claimant is concerned, there is nothing which should deprive him of relief from Congress. The Southern Claims Commission held that they had no jurisdiction, because the claimant was not a full citizen in every sense of the word; but he surely was so far a citizen as to entitle him to protection of his rights of property from this Government. The oath delaring his intention to become a citizen of the United States was an act of expatriation, after which he could not claim redress through the British Government.

The claim is for quartermaster and commissary supplies taken to the value of $2,149.75. No vouchers were given by the officers taking the property, which is explained by the fact that Mr. Tabb and his family were sick at the times with diphtheria. There is evidence showing that on one of the occasions two of Mr. Tabb's children were lying dead in his house from that disease. But there is other satisfactory proof that property belonging to the claimant, of the amount and value alleged, was taken for the use of the Army.

A favorable report in the case was made in the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, recommending that the Southern Claims Commission be given jurisdiction of the claim. Since the commission ceased to exist, it has been the usual way in such cases to recommend the passage of a bill authorizing the Quartermaster-General to examine the claim and report to Congress the facts. This claim, however, is for a small sum, and the proof as to the amount and value of the property taken is very satisfactory.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

SAC AND FOX AND IOWA RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 1577) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservations, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, in line 19, to strike out "withheld" and insert "held;" in line 20, after the word "accepted," to strike out "in full" and insert "at their fair valuation, to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior, in part;" in line 26, to strike out "certificate" and insert "patent;" in line 27, to strike out "section" and insert "act, and the act to which this act is an amendment;" in line 29, to strike out "certificate" and insert "patent;" and, in line 30, to strike out "certified" and insert "patented;" so as to make the bill read:

That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox and Iowa reservations, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That if any member of said Sac and Fox or Iowa tribe of Indians, properly enrolled at the Pottawatomie and Great Nemaha agency, shall elect to remain upon the reservation of his respective tribe, he shall be allowed to select an allotment of land in quantity as follows: If he be the head of a family, 160 acres; if a single person over eighteen years of age, or orphan child under eighteen years of age, 80 acres; and if a minor child under eighteen years of age, 40 acres, heads of families selecting the land for themselves and minor children, and the United States Indian agent for orphan children. The lands so selected shall be held from sale as provided for herein, and shall be accepted at their fair valuation, to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior, in part satisfaction of his interest in and to said reservation, and of the moneys or fund realized from the sale thereof: Provided, That his right to share in the other funds and credits of the tribe shall not be impaired thereby; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a patent to issue to each of the allottees, under the provisions of this act, and the act to which this act is an amendment, for the lands selected by or for such allottee, which patent shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus patented for the period of twenty-five years, in trust for the sole use and benefit of the allottee, or, in case of his decease, of his heirs according to the laws of the State in which said land is situated, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same by patent to said Indian, or his heirs as aforesaid, in fee, discharged of said trust and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever; and if any conveyance shall be made of the lands thus allotted, or any contract made touching the same, before the expiration of the time above mentioned, such conveyance or contract shall be absolutely null and void; and such lands, during such time, shall not be subject to taxation, alienation, or forced sale, under execution or otherwise."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. SQUIRES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1227) granting an increase of pension to William P. Squires, which was, in line 7, to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty-five;" so as to make the rate of pension $45 per month.

The amendment was concurred in.

MARY MARSH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 685) granting a pension to Mary Marsh, which were, in line 4, after the word "pension-roll," to strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and at the end of the bill to add "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendments were concurred in.

EVELINE HUNT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1539) granting a pension to Eveline Hunt, widow, and the minor children of Lewis Hunt, deceased, which were, in line 4 to strike out the word "names" and insert "name;" in line 7, after the word "militia," to strike out the words "and the minor children and heirs of the said Lewis Hunt, deceased;" and to amend the title so as to read "An act granting a pension to Eveline Hunt."

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill (H. R. 902) establishing a subtreasury at Louisville, Ky., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 6665) for the erection of a public building at El Paso, Tex., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add:

That no soldier under this act shall receive less than $8 per month.

Mr. BLAIR. That is an amendment in which the Senator from Illinois is interested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an amendment moved by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. BLAIR. I move to amend the amendment by substituting $4 for $8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where does the original amendment come in?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary does not know, because the amendment does not state where it is to come in. The Chair supposes that it will come in at the end of the bill or wherever it may be appropriate. Will the Senator from Nebraska indicate in what part of the bill the amendment shall be inserted?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Put it at the end of the first section as a proviso in this form:

Provided further, That no soldier under this act shall receive less than $8 per month.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I renew my amendment to the amendment, to substitute $4 instead of $8.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is to make the lowest rate of pension $8. Is that the intention of the Senator?

Mr. VAN WYCK. The amendment was presented with a view of meeting the state of facts illustrated by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN]. For a long time we have necessarily in the number of cases coming before the Pension Committee and for action in both bodies discovered that what seemed to be great injustice was done to soldiers seeking pensions from the mode, system, or manner of weighing disability. A certain maximum is allowed, and then the pension is rated down in proportion to the disability. The result was, as heretofore stated, that a pension may be $1 per month; and so far has this matter of weighing disability been carried in the Pension Office, not only now but under previous administrations of that office, that really they have fixed it in fractions of a dollar, and some pensions are granted not only for $2, but for $2 and a certain number of cents; I think some $2.66.

At all events it would seem improper to go into such fractions, and therefore it was that early in the session I introduced a bill providing that all persons then on the pension-roll receiving less than $8 a month should be pensioned at the rate of $8 per month. When I saw this bill presented here with the provision it contains as to the amount of the pensions, different from what I supposed the committee intended—and I think I may say now that the rate of pension is fixed differently from what a majority of the members of the Pension Committee supposed—I felt that an injustice would be done if the basis of computation was to be the same as heretofore in these cases. I think the persons seeking pensions under this and previous laws would be better protected by being removed as far as possible from adjudication by the Pension Office, and therefore I have felt that a fixed, definite sum named in the law would be a greater protection to the people seeking pensions. So it was that I desired that there should be no pension for less than $8 a month. How high it will be proper to graduate them is another matter, for the consideration of the Senate of course; but the very difficulty under which we labor will be increased by allowing the measuring of pensions in this way.

The great majority of cases reach Congress because after examination by the Pension Office they are rejected or because an increase is denied where there properly should be an increase. To avoid these appeals to Congress I would have the law fix the amount and not leave it as a matter of adjudication by the Department. All Departments of this Government—and the Pension Bureau is not an exception—soon learn to believe that they are placed in power for the sole purpose of protecting the Government. That is certainly one of their duties; but they seem to think that in any event the Government must be protected, and finally they think the protection of the Government requires them to scale down every honest claim and to deny justice where it properly belongs.

Probably the Departments are not to blame, because Congress sets the example. Congress denies justice to its honest creditors, and the majority of Congress seem to believe that it is their duty to protect the Government by denying justice to its creditors. Therefore it is natural that the Pension Bureau and others should be watchful and vigilant in the same direction. But neither the Pension Department nor any other Department should deny to a claimant under the law that which any jury in any court where justice is decently administered would award him by its verdict. But it is so, and we have seen it in thousands of cases.

Now if we frame a bill leaving it optional with the Pension Department to fix the amount of the pension the consequence will be that after that is fixed by the Department three-fourths probably of those entitled to pension will come to Congress and ask the reversal of the judgment of the Department, and a great majority of those cases will properly come to us when the disability is graded down to $2 or $2.66 per month. There is too much of figures and mathematics in such a rating to make it safe for a claimant to get what this law allows him to have. Therefore it is, I trust, that no bill will pass Congress at any time which will place a man on the pension-roll and give him less than $8 a month. I desire at the outset that that much justice shall be done which can not be taken away, and it will save very much expense to the Government in preventing the increase of officers which will otherwise be necessary, and it will save Congress from being overwhelmed with applications for increase of pensions when that increase should have honestly been given originally. If we do not fix a definite sum we shall be here as a board of review to readjudicate and reverse decisions which probably have been improperly made in the Department, and which ought to be reversed.

The point is to protect the soldier and give to him according to the bounty and generosity of this Government as exemplified by acts of Congress, and after we have presented to him this pittance in his old age, in his decrepitude, in his inability to labor, and in his poverty, and when we propose to keep him from the poor-house, his ailments preventing his laboring, is he to be turned off from the Department with a miserable allowance of $1 or $2 or $2.65 a month, as has frequently been done? I desire at least at one end of the line that the soldier shall be protected, and protected to the extent of saying that in no event shall his pension be less than $8 per month.

Mr. PLUMB. I will, to carry out what appears to be the intention of both Senators who have this matter in charge, give notice of an amendment which I will offer to follow the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska in case it shall be adopted, or rather to amend that when it shall be in order. I ask to have this amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). There is an amendment to an amendment pending now, but this can be read for information.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add:

And this rate as applied to the least disability for which any soldier shall be pensioned under this act, shall furnish the basis on which all pensions of persons pensioned hereunder or under any other law shall be adjusted and paid hereafter, saving only pensions for what are known as specific disabilities.

Mr. PLUMB. It would be very unjust indeed to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska in its present shape, because it would give to all pensioners $8 a month equally whether they were disabled more or less, or at all events it would operate to give to one who was disabled one-tenth or one-fourth or one-half as much as to one who was disabled totally. It would not only do that, but it would give to a soldier who has been unable to furnish evidence that his disability occurred in the line of duty a pension at $8 a month notwithstanding he might not be disabled except in a very slight degree, while those who are now on the rolls and have already proven that their disability was incurred in the line of duty and has continued from the date of their discharge until the present time, get, many of them, as I stated in debate here, only $2 a month and from that on up. So, then, if the Senate should establish the rule of paying $8 a month as the lowest pension to those who shall be pensioned under this bill if it shall become a law, it is only proper that we should take the lowest disability as the basis for the adjustment and give to all the others the rating which they are entitled to in proportion to the $8 which you propose to fix as the pay for the slightest disability which can be made the subject of a pension as the result of medical examination.

What we want in the first place is uniformity, and in this case uniformity is equality. If we are to give to persons who are disabled only slightly $8 a month, then we should give to those who are disabled in a greater degree a still greater sum, and we should not in taking up this class who have not been able heretofore to prove and will not, as we assume, be able hereafter to prove that they incurred disability in the line of duty nor that that disability has continued from the date of disability down to the present time, grant them a position upon the pension-roll which gives them greater financial relief than we give to those who have been able to furnish the most conclusive proof required by the Pension Department that their disability occurred in the line of duty and has continued to the present time, which would be the case if the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska were adopted without the addition I propose.

Therefore to carry out the idea the Senator from Nebraska has expressed, my amendment will estbalish $8 as the lowest rate for any disability which shall be determined upon medical examination, and the pension will be graded from that upward except as to special disabilities, such as the loss of an eye, the loss of a limb, and others which are given a special rating under the law.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]:

Provided, however, That all pensions heretofore granted under any previous act to any soldier shall, where less than $8 is or has been allowed, be increased to $8 per month, and no less amount shall be hereafter allowed to any pensioner being a soldier under this or any previous act.

The pensions of children who are provided for in one act are less than those for others, but this is applicable to the soldier's pension, that his pension shall not be less than $8, so as to distinguish as to pensions which are granted to others under the law not having been soldiers.

Mr. PLUMB. The objection to that is the same that I made to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. I think the Senator from Illinois will see at once that his amendment will do great comparative injustice. The rate for what is technically known under the statute as total disability is $8 per month. One-fourth total disability entitles a pensioner to $2 a month; one-half to $4 a month; and so on.

Now, why should there not be a distinction in reference to the grade of disability in effect seriously, permanently destroying the ability to make a living? It is the theory upon which the law itself has proceeded from the very beginning, and the law which was the basis of the contract, which made the contract between the soldier and the Government, and why should that distinction be removed? Why should a person who is disabled one-quarter get as much as one who is disabled totally? Why should one who is disabled one-half get as much as one who is disabled totally? At once the invidious distinction will be apparent, and it will be the source of a great deal of feeling, and very proper feeling, because of the injustice; and many a man will come here and say, "Whereas I have shown that I am disabled totally I get only $8 a month, yet the man who is disabled one-quarter gets as much as I do. If it is fair that he shall have $8 a month, which will not be disputed, then give me in proportion as you give him." And unless some scale of that kind is adopted as applied to the actual disability as shown by the medical examination, we might as well take the whole pension-list from beginning to end and say we will capitalize it at eight, ten, twelve, fifteen, or twenty dollars a month as we see fit.

There is no reason for beginning at the lower grades any more than for beginning at the upper grades. Either there is to be a pension based upon the disability, or it becomes solely and only a service pension in which the question of whether a man lost an arm or a leg or an eye, whether he is totally disabled or half or quarter disabled, cuts no figure whatever, the obligation of the Government to the individual being the same in each and every case. It is to avoid this that I seek to establish a rating below which the pension shall not go. If it is the judgment of the Senate that $8 is the proper rating, then grade the pensions upward from that, so that each pension as granted shall represent the exact measure of disability so far as the medical examination shall determine it which the soldier labors under by reason of his service in the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is certainly mistaken. The amendment which I offered does not affect the grading in the slightest degree. I prepared it especially so that it should not. The grading from $8 and upward is not affected at all. This only provides that no pension shall be granted for less than that sum. It does does not affect the grading from that up.

Mr. PLUMB. But it grades pensions up to $8 a month; and would not a man who is disabled one-fourth get as much as one who labors under total disability?

Mr. LOGAN. Total disability is a grade much higher than $8 a month.

Mr. PLUMB. What is known under the pension law technically as total disability is entitled to $8. There is another grading whereby a different scale of payment is determined to embrace the private soldier up to $24. I am not talking now about a specific disability, the loss of an eye or an arm or a leg. I am talking about the general grades of disability. The Senator must admit that one who is disabled less would get as much as one who is disabled more under his amendment unless he adds to it my provision, which establishes $8 as the lowest possible grade, and bases all other allowances on that lowest rate, that is, grading upward according to the degree of disability.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that as an amendment to mine.

I understand the law to be that pensions are graded according to disability, but, as I said the other day when the Senator was not present, a physician who can determine the disability so as to give one man $1 and another $2 is a physician of extraordinary capacity and capability in his profession. I do not believe in it, and never have believed in it, and I do not expect to be made to believe in it. I do not believe any man who gets a pension of $8 because he receives no more would be dissatisfied with his neighbor who gets $4 if he should be increased to $8. I do not think he would be dissatisfied with that man getting $8 because he did not get any more himself. It does not seem to me that that would be very charitable or generous on the part of men suffering from the same character of disability.

I do not believe in a one-dollar pension; I do not believe in a two-dollar pension, or a three, or a four, or a five, or a six dollar pension. I believe in an eight-dollar pension. That is to say, I do not believe in giving less than that, for if a man is entitled to a pension at all it is because he is disabled and because he is not capable of making a livelihood or at least such a one as he would be able to make if he had not the disability. Therefore, I believe in giving him at least $96 a year, I do not care what his disability is, if under the law he is entitled to a pension at all.

Now, let us go a little further. A man has lost a portion of his hand, or he has a wound, a muscular wound. No one can tell the amount of pain that man suffers. There is no physician on earth who can tell. No man can tell the degree of suffering that a person has from a wound in a joint or from a wound that produces what is known as rheumatism or neuralgia growing out of a wound. I do not believe there is a physician on earth who can tell the degree of disability and the degree of suffering in such cases.

There is more than that in connection with pensions. It is not altogether the fact that a man may suffer so that it is not known to physicians or others. He may be disfigured in some way. A man for the loss of an eye gets a very small pension, and so for the loss of a finger, or the loss of the nose. The Senator may say that is specific. No matter what it is, he gets less than $8 a month. What man would travel through the earth with his nose off for $4 a month? It is not the pain or the suffering, but it is the disfiguration that he suffers from which is the great annoyance. When physicians tell me there is a distinction between a one and a two dollar pension that they can discover, I do not believe it. I do not want to see these discriminations. If a man can not get over $8 a month, I want to see him get $8 a month.

The Senator believes that this will not produce the result he desires up to the amount provided for in this bill. Now, if he will examine the bill he will find that under the law when a man's disability is such that his rating ought to be higher than is allowed under this bill, if he applies for a pension under the old law and gets his rating above this $8 the rating of $8 will commence if this bill passes; but under the law passed heretofore his higher rating will be given to him if he is entitled to more than $8. This only provides for a case where a pension is given on account of a disability that can not be proved to have occurred in the service. Where the disability has occurred in the service and the proof shows that fact, his rating is under the old law and not under this. He makes his application under the other law.

Mr. PLUMB. But under the old law he might get a rating of $2 a month.

Mr. LOGAN. This repeals that.

Mr. PLUMB. Except for the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. He will admit that, I think, while of course he is willing to claim that the doctors do not know anything about this subject——

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is mistaken. I do not claim that they do not know anything about it. The expression is too strong.

Mr. PLUMB. He will admit that there may be grades of disability.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree to that.

Mr. PLUMB. Why should not a man be pensioned according to the grade of his disability? Whether we shall take a man who does not know anything about medicine or surgery to determine it, or whether we shall take anybody we pick up to adjudicate it, is a matter about which I make no argument now. If it is deemed best to say we shall not have medical boards and shall have boards of lawyers or others to determine the degree of disability, be it so; but I want the law so that while the minimum pension shall be $8 a month, where you get above the disability for which $8 is allowed the pension shall be increased accordingly, whether it is left to the Senator from Illinois and myself or a board of doctors or anybody else to determine what the rate of disability is.

I am not saying that in many cases it is hard to tell whether the pension should be $1 or $2 a month, but if the cutting off of one finger is a disability the cutting off of two fingers is a greater. The Senator has seen, as others have, hundreds and thousands of men very little able to get around at all, and he knows those men are disabled more than the men who can get around briskly and who are in good flesh, and yet who are disabled in a perceptible degree. Why not have these pensions based on the disability actually existing, establishing the minimum below which they shall not go, and then grading upward from that? If a man is just disabled so that it can be shown that he can not do as much as he could do if he were in perfectly sound health, allow one rate; and then why not say to a man disabled twice as much, "You shall have twice as much pension as the man just slightly disabled?" That is the point I am aiming at. I am not defending the present system, but we ought to have some way of determining the degree of disability a man is under, or we should say every man shall have the same pension without examination at all except to establish that there is a disability, leaving no power to say what degree of disability exists.

I say the Senator's amendment is going to do the very injustice, though in a less degree, that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will, and we shall have these men coming up here and saying, "Why, if you are rating men by statute, do you not rate us higher? You have rated men only slightly disabled at $8; why not give us, disabled four times as much, some little increase as well?"

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to detain the Senate by discussing this question, but I certainly have not intended to cast any reflection on any physicians or boards; and the Senator from Kansas need not say we will have a board of lawyers. I said I did not believe a physician could tell the distinction always as to the character of disability. The Senator referred to the case of the loss of one or two fingers, but I do not believe as to the character of suffering that the physicians can tell the distinction between the granting of a pension for $1 and $2. That is all I said on that point.

I have no reflection to cast upon physicians or anybody else. I only take that as an illustration that I do not believe any man can tell the amount of suffering that a soldier undergoes, except from his own statement. No one can tell by looking at a man how much suffering he endures. I do not speak it as a reflection on the character of the profession—I have no right to do so; but I speak it as a fact that I do not believe any one is capable of making such a distinction, I do not care how much he knows.

If the Senator desires to have the rating commence at $8—and that is exactly, I think, what my amendment does and what I propose it shall do—let him amend it by saying that this shall be the basis for the rating hereafter. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PLUMB. That is what I propose.

Mr. LOGAN. Your amendment applies to all?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. My amendment does not. It applies only to the soldiers themselves, those who are to have $8 per month, and that is the language that the rating shall be on this basis, and that is all you need.

Mr. PLUMB. Does this bill apply to anybody but soldiers? I understood it pensioned ex-soldiers. I did not know that it applied to others.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose the Senator knows what I mean by pensioning soldiers. The distinction between soldiers and soldiers' children is very great.

Mr. PLUMB. I see the point, but my amendment does not apply to children at all. It applies simply to soldiers. That is because it is based on disability. The law does not recognize disability in a child as the basis of a pension.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but where you want an amendment to apply to a particular thing it is better to state it. Therefore I state that this shall apply to soldiers who are pensioned. I offered this amendment the other day as a substitute for the Senator's amendment. I do not see why if the Senator is so anxious to make his basis, that he can not offer his amendment to this substitute.

Mr. PLUMB. I can.

Mr. LOGAN. Then say this shall be the basis.

Mr. PLUMB. And if the Senator will listen to my amendment he will find that my amendment applies, like his, to soldiers and to nobody but soldiers. If the Senator from Illinois will indulge me a moment further, I will read my amendment to show that it is in perfect harmony with his, only I suppose that he designed his to be the beginning and the end of it, and I wanted to say that I was opposed to the adoption of that amendment or any other one which would cut off some provision for the purpose of putting all persons upon an equality, which that determination of their disability can only bring about. My amendment is this:

> And this rate as applied to the least disability for which any soldier shall be pensioned under this act shall furnish the basis on which the pensions of all persons pensioned hereunder, or under any other law, shall be adjusted and paid hereafter, saving only pensions for what are known as specific disabilities.

So the Senator will see it is in perfect harmony with the idea of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Perhaps an amendment substantially in the form I have drawn would meet the views of both Senators, would be briefer, and might come in instead of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska as a substitute for it, if agreeable to these gentlemen. I shall read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the first amendment in order is that offered by the Senator from New Hampsire to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BLAIR. I only made a suggestion which might help us out of the whole of it, and then I might make a few remarks upon the subject itself. I was going to ask the Senators if language like this would suit them, to add to the end of the first section the following additional proviso:

> And provided further, That no pension paid under any law to any soldier hereafter shall be rated at less than $— per month.

Mr. LOGAN. That would cover it.

Mr. BLAIR. Would that cover the idea?

Mr. PLUMB. No; that is vicious in the same direction in which I conceived the other amendment was, that it does not establish that as the basis from which all rating shall be made up.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly it does; just listen to the language:

> That no pension paid under any law to any soldier hereafter shall be rated at less than $4 per month.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well. Now, if you say in the language of my amendment——

Mr. BLAIR. I have said $4, but the amount is another point.

Mr. PLUMB. I know, but that would require the office to give a uniform rating of $4 per month.

Mr. BLAIR. Nothing less than $4.

Mr. PLUMB. But in that case a man totally disabled would get just as much and more than a man half disabled.

Mr. BLAIR. But this would provide that there should be nothing less than that rate paid.

Mr. PLUMB. How would you rate it above that?

Mr. BLAIR. That would leave the whole body of the law and practice just as it is now.

Mr. PLUMB. Would that establish the basis on which the rating could be made?

Mr. BLAIR. That would establish the starting point. The starting point must be $4.

Mr. PLUMB. That is to say, the least perceptible disability would be rated at $4 and every degree above that would get more?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think it would do so; but if that is the design, my amendment would accomplish the purpose and I do not know that that would. I think that would have the effect of simply putting those now lower than $4 in that category and leaving the remainder undisturbed; whereas what I want is to establish a basis of equality so that a pensioner shall be given $8 as the lowest possible rating and every other pensioner disabled more than that person shall have more in proportion to his disability.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not suppose the Senator means to say that he should have more in proportion, and if he is now rated at $1 he would then be rated at $8, and the man who is being paid $8 would have $64 in order to have eight times as much as the one whose rate of pension is increased from $1 to $8.

Mr. PLUMB. If he is disabled eight times as much, and the other one gets $8, why should he not get eight times as much?

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose the Senator does not make such a proposition.

Mr. PLUMB. I do, undoubtedly; that is to say——

Mr. BLAIR. When our ratings run all the way from $1 to $72 under various laws, though not under the ones perhaps to which the Senator refers, one could hardly tell to what extent it would multiply the pension expenditures to invalid soldiers, putting the pension at eight times the amount of the present rating.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not talking about the question of expenditure; I will come to that later; and I did not suppose the Senator from New Hampshire was especially concerned about that feature of it.

Mr. BLAIR. The truth is, I am too parsimonious in these matters, I suppose. The Senator from Kansas makes a proposition to multiply the pension expenditures to the invalid soldiers by eight, if he means by his proposition what his own explanation shows.

Mr. PLUMB. What I mean to say is that you have established the rate of $8 a month which one person may get who is simply perceptibly disabled, and there is no equality then in putting off a man who is disabled two, three, four, five, or eight times as much, with the same pension. Therefore I propose that whatever basis we do establish shall be the basis from which we shall grade upward according to the grade of disability of the soldier receiving the pension, to be determined by the medical examination, whether one, two, four, or ten times as great.

Mr. BLAIR. There are twelve hundred and sixty invalid soldiers pensioned at the rate of $1 per month. The Senator's proposition, as I understand him, is to give each one of those men $8 per month.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. And the man who is now getting $8 a month would get $64.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not say $8. I simply say, establishing the basis we do establish as the lowest pension, there ought to be a grading upward from that, whether $8 or $10 or $4 is the basis which we establish.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose the point which most Senators wish to reach is just this: There are quite a number of soldiers whose rating is discreditably and contemptibly little, and it seems almost offensive and humiliating that a Government of fifty million or sixty million people who are pretty well off should be paying a dollar, or a dollar and a half, or a dollar and a quarter, or $1.38 a month to a man whom it is worth while to pension at any rate. The object of the Senator from Illinois is to cut off that little work and have it out of the way; and so he assumes that where it is worth while to pension a man at all he ought to have as much as $8.

I supposed that was the point the Senator from Kansas desired to reach, but it seems that it is quite a different one, and that if the basis should be adopted at $8 instead of $1, as it is in these twelve hundred and sixty cases, then when you come to the class who have a pension of $8 they should have $64, and so on. Of course any one can take the invalid pension-list and the table that was published the other day, and which is to be found in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions on the twenty-fifth page, and see to just what extent this would add to the expenditures annually to invalid pensioners. It would increase the amount paid by some hundreds of millions.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BLAIR. For a question, certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I notice that the bill fixes the maximum pension, as far as it pensions anybody, at $24 per month.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the highest rate, and that would be paid for total inability to labor.

Mr. VOORHEES. Would the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska make the pension uniform at $8, no higher and no lower, or is that proposed as the minimum?

Mr. BLAIR. That would be the lowest, and it would vary between $8 and $24 instead of as the bill now is, varying between $1 and $24, according to the degree of the disability.

If the amendment as offered by the Senator from Nebraska should be adopted and it should be applied, as it necessarily must be, with any sort of justice to the invalid soldiers already upon the list, it would increase the annual expenditures about $8,000,000. It would add that amount to the annual payment to the invalid soldiers in the country. It will be seen by an examination of the table to which I have referred that there are one thousand two hundred and sixty soldiers now rated at $1; from $1 to $2 there is one; at $2 there are twenty-six thousand one hundred and thirty-four; rated from $2 to $4 there are three thousand nine hundred and seventy-six; at $4 per month there are sixty thousand two hundred and sixty-eight; from $4 to $6 there are two thousand six hundred and twenty-nine; at $6 there are thirty-four thousand three hundred and thirty-nine; from $6 to $8 there are one thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine; and at $8 there are forty-four thousand seven hundred and seventy-five. To increase the present invalid roll to $8 per month would make an annual additional expenditure of substantially $8,000,000. If we should increase the pensions of those who are drawing less than $4 a month up to $4, so that this little petty work should be entirely dispensed with (if I have not made a mistake, and I think I have not), that would increase the annual expenditure less than $1,000,000. As I have figured it, it would make $720,000—that is, taking those upon the present roll. I may be possibly slightly inaccurate, and it may be placed at a million dollars. I do not think that the amendment I have suggested of $4 a month would involve us upon the existing roll in an annual increased expenditure of more than a million dollars, and it would wipe out the offensive littleness of this business to which the Senator from Illinois has referred, and which it does seem to me is in a way so contemptible that it ought to be obliterated.

Of course this amount of $1,000,000 would be somewhat increased if the bill should become a law, because, under the bill as it now is, the rating would be from $1 to $24, and there would be some of these men who would be rated less than $4. Perhaps $500,000 might be a fair addition to the increased pension-roll if we should amend the bill by providing that the lowest rate paid under this and any act should be $4 a month. That would make $1,500,000 a year. I do not think it would exceed that.

As to the basis, whether it should be adopted at $4, $6, or $8, of course with my looseness in money matters to which the Senator has alluded I would not be particular one way or the other. But I am not that sort of a man. I am parsimonious, conservative, and determined to guard the purse-strings of the country. I am, I think, notably the watch-dog of the Treasury, and I mean to be such hereafter. It does not seem to me that we can afford to put the lowest rate at $8 a month. It is too much. Perhaps the soldiers deserve it, but on the other hand you know how it is; this country is growing poorer and poorer every day. We are not accumulating money as fast as we ought to be doing; and our Democratic friends and some others have a somewhat marked tendency, I think, to distribute the surplus and to increase the taxes in a manner most lamentable to behold; and I do not think we can endure it. The future of the country is compromised, and we ought to pay some attention to the maxims of Poor Richard. It is time that we revert to them.

For my part, I think we should arrange this business in such way as to give the soldier, the man whom it is worth while to go through the performance of pensioning at all, $48 a year for the smallest disablity, which may be a wound in the little toe or the obliteration of one end of his little finger or the finger of his left hand. If we give him $48 a year that is pretty fair on the whole, considering the close circumstances of the country. That would buy his flour, it would pay for his fuel, clothe himself and his wife and perhaps his children, for I tell you, Mr. President, that $48 dollars a year is a great deal of money to thousands and hundreds of thousands of American people! It would pay their taxes, pay their rent, and help them a great deal.

At the same time, when we consider that this comes out of the national Treasury, and the national Treasury is filled, as we all know, by the sweat of the poor man, many of the poor men never having been soldiers at all, and while we are to derive this taxation from them, in a certain sense blood-money exacted from them by the hard heart of the Federal tax imposer and tax collector, it seems to me that that is about the fair thing to do. I will warrant you if we make the basis, the lowest point $4 a month, the soldiers of the country will be well satisfied. They are reasonable men. They are not in pursuit of political prominence, many of them, and the $48 a year would be exceedingly satisfactory everywhere, in my belief.

I should be gratified if the Senator from Illinois would see this, and if he would be willing to offer his substitute in such a way as to effectuate these ideas, making the basis $4 a month; and if we should take this language or something like that which I have suggested, it would avoid all the difficulties with reference to the existing body of law and leave all those questions to which the Senator from Kansas has alluded, the complications that would arise from an indefinite and heedless plunge into the existing law; it would avoid all those troubles and there could be no misunderstanding of a simple provision that the lowest pension paid, which would cut off the little things I have mentioned, should be $4 a month. Of course, if the Senate is inclined to fix the matter at $8 a month, I should acquiesce, although it seems to me that it is a pretty formidable thing to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, limiting the amount to $4 a month.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the question on that amendment?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, it being an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment of the text. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will come in afterward.

Mr. LOGAN. I will offer an amendment as a substitute for the whole, and if that be voted down, then we can act on the other propositions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all pensions heretofore granted under any previous act to any soldier shall, where less than $8 is or has been allowed, be increased to $8 per month, and no less amount shall be hereafter allowed to any pensioner being a soldier under this or any previous act; and this shall be the basis for rating in cases of specific or total disability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be first taken on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, limiting the amount to $4 per month.

Mr. LOGAN. Will not the proposition be first on the substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be first taken on perfecting the text of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, which is the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, limiting the amount to $4 instead of $8.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska applies only to pensions under this act. It does not embrace those outside of this act. The question then is on the substitution of $4 for $8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the substitution of $4 for $8. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 1 it is proposed to add the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no soldier under this act shall receive less than $8 per month.

The amendment to the amendment is to strike out "eight" and insert "four;" so as to read:

Provided further, That no soldier under this act shall receive less than $4 per month.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired upon this amendment with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL. My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

Mr. MILLER. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. I do not know how he would vote, but if he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. It is not in order, but I should be glad to know if this is the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I voted as I intended to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment, that of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], will be stated.

Mr. HARRIS. What becomes of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is subject to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to perfect the text.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment:

And this rate, as applied to the least disability for which any soldier shall be pensioned under this act, shall furnish the basis on which the pensions of all persons pensioned hereunder or under any other law, shall be adjusted and paid hereafter, saving only pensions for what are known as specific disabilities.

Mr. PLUMB. I will modify my own amendment so as to strike out the word "persons" and substitute the word "soldiers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I offer the substitute that I offered as a substitute for this.

Mr. PLUMB. I will withdraw my amendment and let the Senator from Illinois propose his substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. PLUMB. I will offer my amendment at a later period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be taken, and the amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 1 it is proposed to add:

Provided further, That all pensions heretofore granted under any previous act to any soldier shall, where less than $8 is or has been allowed, be increased to $8 per month, and no less amount shall be hereafter allowed to any pensioner, being a soldier, under this act or any previous act; and this shall be the basis for rating in cases of total disability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Illinois for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the purpose I think he has in mind would be better accomplished by an amendment that shall be the basis of rating for total disability. Why should it not read "or any grade thereunder?" That is to say, if he designs to make a pension based upon the actual disability, why should he give one who is disabled only in a slight degree as much as he does to a person totally disabled?

Mr. LOGAN. The distinction is perfectly clear, if a person will only think of it for a moment. The suggestion of the Senator from Kansas would cause an increase of the rating of those who are now pensioned at $8 a month in accordance with the raising of the pension of those below $8 a month. That is not my intention at all. My intention is to let those who are at $8 a month remain at $8 a month unless they are entitled to more under the law, and if they are they can get it by applying to the Pension Office, but to increase those who are below $8 a month to $8 a month, and let $8 be the rate of pensions granted hereafter under the law or those granted heretofore under the law; and where there is a total disability, that that shall be the basis of the rating. The specific disability is provided for already. So far as the language is concerned it is immaterial. That is the object of the amendment I offer; that is exactly what the result will be, and that is what I mean by it. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The lowest existing rate of disability I believe is entitled to a pension of $1 a month. This proposes to substitute for that unit $8 a month, so that if a soldier was disabled by having the first joint of his little finger shot off in an engagement, which would now give him a dollar a month, he shall be entitled to receive $8 a month. Then the amendment, which does not clearly establish its effect in my mind, declares that this shall be the basis for all ratings above $8 as they now exist. It simply multiplies by eight the lowest sum that is allowed for a pensionable disability. I suppose that the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois would be to multiply each one of the sums now allowed by eight. It will increase the sum now allowed for pensionable disabilities eight times.

Mr. MILLER. A man could receive a hundred dollars a month.

Mr. INGALLS. I should say so, if I can understand the language of the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator's colleague [Mr. PLUMB] explained that away.

Mr. INGALLS. Where a man gets $8 a month now he would have $64 a month.

Mr. LOGAN. That is absurd.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Illinois says that is absurd. I ask the Chief Clerk to read the amendment over again and let us understand whether it is absurd or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That all pensions heretofore granted under any previous act to any soldier shall, where less than $8 is or has been allowed, be increased to $8 per month, and no less amount shall be hereafter allowed to any pensioner, being a soldier, under this or any previous act, and this shall be the basis for rating in cases of total disability.

Mr. INGALLS. "This shall be the basis for rating in cases of total disability"—that is to say, you have increased the unit of lowest disability by multiplying it by eight. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] made a suggestion of course that is not borne out fully by the law, because I believe that the highest rate allowed for total disability now is $72 a month. That is not specific; that would not come within the class of cases known as specific disabilities, which could result from rheumatism, from paralysis, from nervous prostration, from a variety of causes which would be regarded as a specific disability. Therefore I should say, notwithstanding the eminent authority of the Senator from Illinois who characterized my deduction as absurd, that under the strict literal interpretation of the amendment if it becomes a law the man who now receives $72 a month for total disability would be entitled to have that multiplied by eight, and he would then receive $576 per month, if that is the amount of seventy-two multiplied by eight.

I know the Senator from Illinois does not intend to be brusque or discourteous in the observations which he made about the character of my suggestion, but if that is not a legitimate and fair interpretation to be placed upon that language I certainly am unable to comprehend it. I trust therefore if the object is other than that, if the purpose is not what is named in the amendment itself, that we shall have such a modification of it as at least will not leave it open to an absurd interpretation coming from those who would certainly be disposed to regard it in a friendly aspect.

Mr. LOGAN. In order to relieve the amendment from anything that would be liable to be misconstrued I will strike out the latter part of it. I added that to it in order to conform to the views of the Senator's colleague, which he discussed in a different light from what the Senator now does, and I came to the same conclusion that he did, that the basis of the rating would be $8 and not eight times $8.

But in order that there shall be no dispute about it, as I put it in at the suggestion of others, I will strike it out. Let the amendment be read as I offered it first, and then there will be no dispute about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Protided, however, That all pensions heretofore granted under any previous act to any soldier shall, where less than $8 is or has been allowed, be increased to $8 per month, and no less amount shall be hereafter allowed to any pensioner, being a soldier, under this or any previous act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are demanded on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Before that is acted upon, as a part of the Senate is now here that was not here during the previous discussion, I think that a few things ought perhaps to be repeated.

I have stated once the number of soldiers who are now receiving pensions at less than $8 a month. In round numbers there are about one hundred and twenty-five thousand of the two hundred and forty-odd thousand invalid soldiers whose pensions now are rated at less than $8 per month. Sixty thousand of those are now rated at $4 per month, and about thirty thousand at from $1 to $4. That makes ninety thousand, and from ninety thousand up to about one hundred and twenty-five thousand are rated between $4 and $8. These ratings are made by the medical examining boards of the country, sworn officers, competent surgeons who under oath and actual examination rate these men in this way. I do not know any reason why we should impeach their official finding and say that the rating shall be $8, the same as the rating for total disability. Total disability is stiffness of one elbow-joint, and a man who is disabled to the extent of a stiff elbow-joint is entitled to $8, for that is the rule. Any disability which is equivalent to a stiff elbow-joint of either arm is called a total disability for a private and is rated at $8.

The one hundred and twenty-five thousand men who have an infinite variety of disabilities less than that, running all the way from $8 down to a single dollar, are rated in the way I have stated by these sworn officials of the Government. I admit that a dollar a month is a little thing to bother about, and a dollar and a quarter a month is rather a small matter. It seemed to me that in order to get rid of this national littleness we might say that the lowest pension paid at all should be $4 a month, leaving all the rest to stand just as it does.

The Senate acting upon a suggestion of a substitution of $4 for $8 voted that they would not make the substitution, and that brought the question upon the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, his basis being $8 per month so far as all the additions under this bill are concerned.

Now the Senator from Illinois comes in with his amendment as a substitute for the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, which is, in effect, to take the soldiers rated at less than $8 per month, the various gradations that I have stated, the one hundred and twenty-five thousand men now rated at less than $8 per month, and place them all on the roll at $8 a month; so that a man who has his little finger affected is to receive hereafter exactly the pension given to the man who has a stiff elbow of either arm.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], understanding the amendment offered by way of a substitute by the Senator from Illinois precisely as the other Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] explained his proposition, goes on to draw his logical deductions that some would be entitled, $8 being the basis of rating, to the amount of $500 per month, those who would have the very highest pension. That, however, has been obviated by the Senator from Illinois, who strikes out the addition, so that the substitute upon which the Senate is now to vote provides that everybody now rated at less than $8 shall hereafter be rated at $8 per month—all upon an equality with the men who have a disability equivalent to a stiff elbow-joint and who have hitherto been entitled under the law to $8 per month.

If this be adopted, it must at once result that the inequality of pension paid to the men whose disability is very slight as compared with the men now upon the roll who will remain payable at $8 per month must at once produce a sense of injustice; and adopting $8 a month as the lowest possible rate, we shall be inevitably by subsequent legislation obliged to make the increase appropriate to the higher rates of disability which are to be found among our soldiers; that is, higher than this most trivial class, who are to be rated hereafter at $8 per month.

I do not think that this sort of interjection into the general pension system ought to be made. It is quite indefinite as to what the result may be in the way of expenditure, and certainly it does seem to me that it will result in an absolute perpetration of inequality and injustice under which the country as well as the soldiers will become restive, and we shall be obliged by subsequent legislation either to strike this all out again and go back to the old system or to immensely and indefinitely increase our subsequent ratings.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am opposed to the pending amendment. Under the existing pension laws we allow those physically disabled from manual labor (and that is the ground upon which a pension is granted) pensions ranging from $1 to $8 per month. This proposes to change that whole system and put the minimum pension at $8 per month, as I understand it. There are 1,260 pensioners rated at $1 per month, one at $1.87, and 26,134 at $2. I find that there are 31,371 pensioners receiving less than $4 per month, and there are 128,636 pensioners receiving less than $8 per month; so that 128,636 pensioners are the number to be affected by this provision.

I have not been able to make an exact calculation of the effect of this amendment, but taking those who receive pensions at the rate of $2 per month it will add to them $6 per month; it will add to those who receive $4 $4 per month; and to those who receive $6 it will add as a matter of course $2. I find that there are 60,268 soldiers receiving $4 per month. I have made a calculation not of all the different rates, but of those who are receiving pensions at the rate of $1, $2, $4, $5, and $6 per month, and the increase would be about $600,000 per month or $7,200,000 per annum. Taking those who are receiving between $1 and $2 and between $2 and $4, and so on, I think it might be very safe to say that the effect of the amendment would be an increase of $10,000,000 per annum to the amount expended for pensions, a small item, it is true, but worth considering in legislation.

I am opposed to the amendment for the further reason that it would create a great inequality, in my judgment. We allow pensions for physical disability. Where the applicant is disabled from manual labor he receives $8 a month; where he is only disabled one-half he receives $4 per month; and one-fourth, $2 per month. There would be no justice in giving the soldier one-fourth disabled from manual labor the same amount that you give the soldier totally disabled, nor would there be any justice in giving the soldier disabled one-half from manual labor the same amount that you give the soldier disabled totally. I do not believe that it would be right or just.

Mr. MORRILL. I am very anxious that this bill shall take a shape in which I can vote for it myself, and also a shape that will make it possible to become a law. Upon the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire the last time this bill was under consideration that it would not create a burden upon the Treasury of more than $18,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year, I thought it was no greater than what the country could bear; but I have looked at the RECORD of the debate when this same proposition was before the Senate in 1884, and I find a statement made by the then Senator from Oregon, Mr. Slater. He said, in the first place, "there are two hundred and seventy-five thousand undisposed-of claims upon the files of the Department, with an annual rating of $33,000,000 which we are paying."

Mr. BLAIR. Claims undisposed of?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. Then they can not be drawing anything.

Mr. MORRILL. He says, it is fair to assume that each one of these two hundred and seventy-five thousand claims must necessarily at once become a vital force; that is, that they would all come in and be allowed for a disability of some description or other. Then he says:

> It is a very low estimate if we calculate that 25 per cent. shall be entitled to pensions of the one million who have not presented any claims who are known to be living, and these estimates allow for five hundred thousand of the Union Army who have gone to their graves since the close of the war.

He adds the following words:

> * Allowing the number to be five hundred thousand, and supposing the average rate to be $4 a month, we will have added under this bill at once $24,000,000 to the annual rating under that clause alone, to say nothing of the Mexican war pensions or of the widows' pensions or of the dependent relatives. If you will figure this out you will see that under any arrangement that can be made the bill will provide for more than doubling the present annual pension rate, which is now $33,000,000, and in all reasonable probability it will reach more nearly $50,000,000 per annum.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] in reply to this said:

> Before the question is taken I wish to make one or two statements that may have a little bearing upon the pecuniary importance of the pending amendment. It is quite as large as it might appear to be from the statements of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Slater]. I did not hear all that he said, but I have no doubt that if the amendment is adopted it will involve an annual addition to the pension expenditures of the country of $50,000,000.

I desire to know whether the Senator from New Hampshire adheres to his estimate made a day or two since of $18,000,000 or $20,000,000, or whether he goes back to the one he assented to in 1884.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator had observed the debate at this session he would have known that I have been over that matter several times already. I do not understand that that estimate was made with reference to the pending bill.

Mr. MORRILL. It was the Van Wyck amendment which was then under consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. No, it was the Cullom amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. No, it was the Van Wyck amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I know my recollection is not at fault about it. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] may have spoken on the subject, but perhaps the Senator from Vermont will remember that the Mexican pension bill came from the House of Representatives in the Forty-eighth Congress. It was referred to the Committee on Pensions. The Committee on Pensions reported it back with what was known as the Cullom amendment. A bill had gone to the committee which made or assumed to make provision for soldiers who had been disabled. Having been changed considerably in the committee, it was reported back in the form of an amendment to the Mexican pension bill, and in the Senate the question was upon the passage of the bill with this amendment of the committee. Upon the amendment of the committee I said at that time what has been read, that I thought it would involve the country in an expenditure of $50,000,000.

The Cullom amendment embraced several other classes of pensioners besides those who are embraced in the present bill. It embraced widows. We have already passed a bill referring to one class of widows and increased their pensions by an annual cost which has been estimated at from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000. They are not included in this bill; and so of some others.

As I stated upon the floor of the Senate the other day, my estimate was at that time made without the opportunity of close examination, and any estimate of course is somewhat uncertain because the data can not be obtained. My estimate was then four times as much as what is understood to have been the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions, who I believe, as was stated by some one upon the floor—certainly in conversation I have heard him so quoted—estimated the expenditures under what is this bill at about twelve and a half million dollars.

My estimate thus to be found in the RECORD and made in the way I have stated with reference to all these classes was about twice what anybody called it even then. I do not know about the estimate of the late Senator from Oregon. I know there was a prevalent impression in the committee and on my own part that the estimates of the Senator from Oregon were as large as they well could be. I do not think anybody would be inclined to estimate the expenses under the bill now reported to the Senate at any such rate. Of course we do not know how much the bill will cost if it becomes a law; but we do know that we undertake only to assist those who must be aided by somebody; and the rule is, to this extent at all events, an inflexible one, that under its provisions no soldier will receive anything except a man who is dependent upon his own work for his living, who is disabled to a greater or less extent from earning his living; and who, consequently, has to be aided by the Grand Army, who are getting old and poor themselves and are made up very largely of the same men.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire, if he will permit me, to the fact that Senator SLATER was discussing the Van Wyck amendment, excluding Mexican pensions, excluding all pensions for widows, and that after he made that statement the Senator from New Hampshire said he had no doubt that the estimate of the Senator from Oregon was not too high.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will remember that in my language, as he just read it, I said I did not understand all that the Senator from Oregon had said, and I say now to the Senator from Vermont that the language I used there had reference to the entire Cullom amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. That does not appear.

Mr. BLAIR. I think it appears; I think it must appear from any fair reading of the context of the entire discussion. However that may be, it is neither one thing nor another to the debate to-day.

As I was saying, there is to this extent an iron and inflexible rule by which the expenditure would be limited, that the country is only called upon to pay to those who are poor and must be helped by somebody, and who are actually disabled without their own fault from the earning of their living. At present those people must be uncomfortable, hungry, cold, and unprotected from the elements to some extent, or else the deficiency in their means of livelihood must be made up by the contributions of others, and those contributions must come from private charity, they must come from the Grand Army, which does what it can to relieve such cases, and which, as I said before, is itself made up of this very same class of poor men very largely, who are themselves growing old and poor and in want of health, and therefore ought not to be called upon to any greater extent nor any longer to contribute to the support of this class, or relief must come from the poor-houses of the various States and localities where these men live, or the money must be paid by the nation at large.

Since the burden is to fall somewhere, either upon the soldier in the form of contribution from those who surround him and as a rule are unable to contribute to his support, and most of them unable to do more than maintain themselves comfortably, or upon the poor-house, or upon the nation, where ought that burden to fall?

Since the general burden of expenditure in giving these men a comfortable livelihood is not to be increased and the sixty million people simply take it among themselves in aliquot parts according to the ratio and the rules of taxation, throughout the country at large, I submit that the fair and equitable thing is to put that burden where it belongs, upon the whole mass, upon the nation whose integrity these men helped to preserve; for it is to be remembered that these men are the ones who did the fighting. The bill covers only the cases of those who actually did service and the dependent parents of those men who are themselves in want and suffering, and no others. Those men got through the war without disability; they are the men who rendered one, two, three, four, and in some cases five years of service; so that the country in the form of putting down the rebellion received from those men far more than it did from those who contracted disabilities, and so rendered a much shorter period of service. The equity of the thing as between the benefit received by the Government on the one side and the service rendered by these men on the other, is greater as between the nation and the men who were only disabled after they had served out their full period of service in the war.

Whether the country is able to bear this burden is a question, of course, for every Senator to decide for himself. I think I have made clear the suggestion that the burden is to be borne by somebody, by the soldier in the form of suffering, or by individuals, or by local communities, and that it is not increased in the actual amount of contribution by placing it upon the nation at large who received the benefit.

It is not fair to ask any one who comes in with a measure of this kind or supports a measure of this kind to give to exact dollars or to a million of dollars the amount of expenditures under it. It is essential; and it should appear that the principles involved in the bill are based upon equity and justice and that the honor of the country and the duty of the country are involved in the extension of assistance to those men. That appearing, when we can see by the number of men, by the rules of mathematics, that there is a limit and a reasonable limit to the entire expenditure—when all that is apparent in the provisions of the bill, and there are precedents in the case of the Revolutionary soldiers and the soldiers of the war of 1812 and those of the Mexican war (the latter of which we have indorsed by passing it through the Senate and several times through the House), I submit that it is not exactly the fair way of discussing this bill to find fault with estimates which in their nature must be somewhat indefinite for the very reason that no man can make an absolute prophecy as to the future.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator permit a single word? I hope the Senator does not understand that I was trying to make a point against the bill; but I wanted him to give such an explanation as would show to the country that we were voting for no bill that was going to take out $50,000,000 or $100,000,000.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know but that it will take a hundred millions. I do not undertake to say it will not take a hundred millions. I undertake to say it will not take out of the nation any money that otherwise has not got to come out of somebody, either in the form of starvation, cold, hunger, nakedness, or in the form of contribution by people who live in the vicinity of these men, or by the pauper system of the States or the contributions of the Grand Army. I undertake to say that much.

As to the actual number of the men whose cases are now pending in the Pension Office on an allegation of disability contracted in the service, those cases not yet acted upon I have not taken into account in this bill very much. They allege that they have claims under the general pension laws, and the general pension laws are much more favorable than this law will be, and if they can establish their claim under those laws they will get more than they will under this measure.

There may be some of them, there undoubtedly will be many of them, who, worn out with the effort to establish their claims on account of the failure of proof and other causes, will finally fall back on the comparatively less remedial features of this law and get something in their old age under the provisions of this bill if it should become a law. But, outside of that, I thought it was a fair estimate to fix the number that would be entitled to its benefits, who would gradually establish their claims, at two hundred and fifty thousand. That would be about one-fourth of the entire number of soldiers now supposed to be alive in the country. Those would not all come upon the roll at once. If there were two hundred and fifty thousand added at once to the roll, according to the best estimate that I could make, based upon the list of the adjudications in the table and ratings of the disabilities of the invalid pensioners, assuming that the same rules were followed by boards of examination with reference to these men that they have now adopted with reference to those upon the invalid-roll, the highest pension not being over $24, I thought the amount payable to this class, assuming the two hundred and fifty thousand to be upon the rolls at once, would be about $20,400,000.

In addition to that there would be the dependent parents. I could not judge in regard to that class exactly, but I presume that a very large number of dependent parents are upon the roll now, and I thought it would be fair to assume that the entire expenditures under the bill without any amendments increasing its expensiveness would be perhaps $25,000,000. But I do not make any prophecy that that is the amount, nor do I undertake to enter any warranty that twice that amount will not be called for by the bill. I only point to the justice of this provision and to the fact that somebody has got to bear the burden.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I can not understand the argument which has been adduced in opposition to this amendment by calling attention to a certain class of injuries to men who might claim a pension. Our attention was called to the fact that a man might lose a little finger and he would get $1 a month, and if he lost another one he would get $2 a month. Are we to estimate injuries to a person the same as you would purchase pork? That seems to me to be a very strange argument. Upon the principle which was suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire a little finger is worth $1 a month, the next finger is worth $2 a month, the next $4 a month, the next $6 a month, and the next $8 a month. Is that the way it is to be estimated?

Mr. BLAIR. I made no suggestion of a method of that kind.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood the Senator from Kansas to say that if one finger was worth $1 a month the estimate would be that the second was worth $2, the third $3, the fourth $4, and the fifth $5, which is the pension that may be given for the loss of a hand. Who ever heard of such a rule as that about injuries done to the person?

Let me put one question. Our friends on the other side are anxious always for the passage of what is called the Mexican pension bill. Why do we not rate men according to their age in that measure and their disability from age? You give them $8 per month as a service pension; you give them $8 per month for their service. If there is to be a distinction made, a man who is seventy-five years old should receive more than a man who is fifty years old according to that argument.

I do not believe this Government does the magnanimous act to its soldiers and dependents where it gives $1 a month for any kind of injury, I do not care what it is. If it is a scratch on the nose and is an injury sufficient to have a pension paid the person ought to have more than $1 a month. It is absurd and ridiculous to talk about giving a man $1 a month, and here one man is rated at $1.80 per month. As I said this morning a physician must be a remarkable man who can see the difference between $1 and $2 in an injury when the man has pains or disease, and in fact they reduced one man from $2 down to $1.80 and allowed him a pension of $1.80 per month. That proposition to my judgment is absurd; I do not care what physicians do it.

There is one point in reference to this bill which has not been noticed. If you raise the pension and equalize it and make it $8 per month, you by that means reduce the expenses in one line by reducing the number of boards who examine these one-dollar, two-dollar, and three-dollar pensioners every three months for the purpose of ascertaining their disability. You reduce that portion of the expense very greatly.

As I said on a former occasion, I do not wish to discuss the amendment I have offered on the ground of the amount of money it takes out of the Treasury. I desire it to be discussed on the theory as to whether it is right or wrong. If a man draws a pension from his Government and is entitled to an eight-dollar pension, it is not a question as to whether the Government has now at this time that $8 arranged and set aside for his benefit. It is a question whether this Government intends to perform an obligation which rests upon it toward the men who preserved and protected it. That should be the only question asked in reference to these pensions, where you do not put them too high, as a pension going to a man who is entitled to it.

It may be a very fitting time, perhaps, to call the attention of the country at least, whether I can the attention of Senators or not, to the distinctions which are made in this country against the poor soldier who volunteered in behalf of his Government. By the very laws you have passed, if a man is pensioned as a major-general belonging to the Army of the United States known as regular Army, if it is called retirement he is paid $5,625 per annum, but if he was a major-general in the volunteer service he receives $360 per annum. It is a fact that the Congress of the United States since 1861, when that law was passed, has discriminated against the poor unfortunate voluuteer every time he knocks at the door of this great Capitol. Because a man may have served one year in the regular Army, no longer than than a volunteer of the same rank, performing the same service, entering at the same time and retiring at the same time, you pay one $1,800 and the other $204 a year.

It is for the reason that these discriminations have been made by the Congress of the United States that there is complaint among the poor soldiers of this country that you give to a man who served his country honestly and faithfully $12 a year as a pension. I say it is a disgrace to this Government. Talk about the little finger for the purpose of ridiculing the idea of a pension! Give him no pension if he is not entitled to it, but if he is entitled to it give him one that at least will buy him a week's lodging. To turn a man out on the world at $12 a year, or $24 a year, or $48 a year, is that which this great Government should never do.

My friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] said he hoped a bill would be so prepared that he could vote for it. I remember very well when at the head of a committee in the other branch of Congress his great abilities were brought to bear for the purpose of affording facilities to this Government to put down the great rebellion against it. We never thought then that he would ask "how much is it going to take out of the Treasury to pay the unfortunate men a pension for saving this Government." No, sir, it is an afterthought; it is a thought brought into this Chamber from the other side; it is the adoption of arguments against pensions by our own people, who ought not, in my judgment, to bring to bear this character of argumentation against these unfortunate men.

I say give every man who is entitled to a pension $8 per month. Oh, says the Senator from New Hampshire, that makes a discrimination between the man who has a stiff arm and the man who has lost two fingers perhaps; the one with total disability gets but $8, and, therefore, you should not give the other one $8. The old Revolutionary soldier got his $8 or his widow got her $8. So did the child. Why give the child the same pension you gave the mother? Was not that a discrimination? The age of one was a disability; the age of the other was not.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose the Senator does not mean to be understood that the child received $8 and the parent $8 at the same time?

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no; not at the same time.

Mr. BLAIR. The child received it on the ground of dependence, while the parent received it on the ground of another disability—age.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the ground.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that there is no difference then between the policy and action of the Government in reference to the Revolutionary soldier and its policy and action with reference to the soldier of the late war.

Mr. LOGAN. The only difference is that the same amount of pension was given to each and every one by the law in that case.

Mr. BLAIR. It does so now. When the parent dies the child takes the pension which would have belonged to the parent, the full amount.

Mr. LOGAN. The child gets $8 a month.

Mr. BLAIR. No, the child would then get $20 a month, the rate for the rank of captain if the father held that rank, for all the discrimination disappears when the soldier or officer dies in consequence of the service, and the pension, which then becomes a derivative pension, goes to his representative, and that representative takes the full amount for total disability.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that perfectly. According, then, to the argument of the Senator, if the man who gets a dollar a month dies the pension goes to the child and the child gets a dollar a month. Is that it?

Mr. BLAIR. I did not offer that as an argument. I simply offered it as a statement of fact which was contravening the Senator's assertion, as I understood it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. Now that is the logic and that is the law.

Mr. BLAIR. Deal with the law then.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I will deal with the law and with those who propose to support the law.

The Senator says because the child was dependent upon its father or its mother, therefore it received the same pension as the parent. The child dependent on the father who to-day receives a dollar a month, no matter what his dependence, gets a dollar a month.

Mr. BLAIR. There may be some reason for that. The father is paid on account of disability contracted in the service and paid according to the degree of that disability—that is the law—and according to that degree, as settled by the medical examination. In these contemptible cases that I should like to get rid of it is only a question of degree. Suppose it to be a dollar a month. He is living and he is as good a man as ever, save that $1 per month disability which the Government makes up to him, and he supports his child.

Mr. LOGAN. He is a first-class man except that he lacks a dollar a month of being so.

Mr. BLAIR. He lacks $12 a year of being a first-class man. That is the law; but we are now speaking of the case of the child who, when the father dies, becomes entitled to the same pension that that man would have if he were totally disabled. He dies; his source of support to the child is wholly taken away. The Government takes the position of the parent in that case and furnishes the child just what the parent would receive if totally disabled; that is, his $20 a month if the rank was that of captain. That is the reason why the child gets more than the parent.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to detain the Senate. I have spoken on this bill two or three times and have said all I care to say about it, except to call the attention of the country to the distinction and discrimination that is made between different classes of soldiers, no matter whether one is as good as another or not. This discrimination has been made by Congress, and Congress ought to undo it; Congress ought to retrace its steps; and when we are requested to do it in justice to these men we ought not to be called upon every day and asked how much is it going to cost. Who can tell? The chairman of this committee can not tell how much it is going to cost. It is an impossibility. No one can tell. It will not cost, however, the amount that has been charged. The Senate has been affrighted time and again out of supporting proper bills for the benefit of men who were entitled to relief because of the fact that it was told it would cost so many millions of dollars. I know there was a time in this country—it has passed many years, it is true—when Senators now on this floor would have pledged their lives and their fortunes to the soldiers in the field for pensions or bounties if they could only have had the assurance that those soldiers would bring back the old flag of their country that it might be unfurled over every inch of soil belonging to the United States of America.

But, sir, you needed not that pledge. They did bring it back, they did unfurl it over your heads, and now they come beneath that old banner and say to you, "In the name of the Stars and Stripes, in the name of all that belongs to the perpetuity of this great Government of ours, take away this dollar a month, take away these two or these four dollars a month and recognize us as men entitled at least to receive something that is but a pittance in maintaining us and our families;" and, sir, I hope the Republican party in this body will never so far forget itself as that it will allow a proposition as fair as this to be voted down on account of a desire to prevent money coming from the Treasury of the United States, that it may be piled up mountain high, so that in times coming it may be said, "Economy has been our watchword."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on this amendment; which will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 1:

Provided, however, That all pensions heretofore granted under any previous act to any soldier shall, where less than $8 is or has been allowed, be increased to $8 per month; and no less amount shall be hereafter allowed to any pensioner, being a soldier, under this or any previous act.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the question is taken, I wish to say that if the amendment shall be rejected I will then move to add to the first section these words:

And provided further, That no pension paid under any law to any soldier hereafter shall be rated at less than $1 per month.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

So the amendment of Mr. LOGAN was rejected.

Mr. BLAIR. I now move to insert at the end of the section the following words:

And provided further, That no pension paid under any law to any soldier hereafter shall be rated at less than $4 per month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate now is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. BLAIR. I move this as a substitute for that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That is the same proposition which was voted down awhile ago, I understand.

Mr. BLAIR. This is not the same proposition that was offered before. The proposition offered before was to strike out "eight" and insert "four," which related only to this act. This covers all cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And provided further, That no pension paid under any law to any soldier hereafter shall be rated at less than $4 per month.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator state wherein this differs from the proposition we voted on before?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Nebraska asks me wherein this proposition differs from the one already voted upon, which was an amendment to his amendment as moved by myself, and which was rejected in order that the Senate might proceed to act upon the substitute of the Senator from Illinois. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska proposed to fix the lowest rate of all pensions to be paid under this bill, if it becomes a law, at $8 a month. The amendment which I moved, and which was rejected, was to strike out the word "eight" in his amendment and insert the word "four," so that if it had been adopted, and then the amendment itself adopted, the bill would have provided that no pension paid to the new class provided for by this bill should be less than $4 a month. That was the proposition which was voted upon by the Senate.

Now, I offer as a substitute for the entire amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, which relates only to the class embraced in this bill, a provision that no pension hereafter paid to any soldier under any law, this or any other law, shall be less than $4 per month, fixing the minimum for all soldier pensioners under this or any other act at $4 a month. The reasons for this are precisely the same that could be adduced and were adduced in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois and that offered by the Senator from Nebraska, save that it fixes the minimum at $4 rather than $8.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, Mr. President, what is the parliamentary state of this proposition? On what are we to be called upon to vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska limiting to $8 a month, to which the Senator from New Hampshire offers a substitute.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no such thing known in parliamentary law as a substitute. We must vote on this as an amendment to that proposition or else let it go by. What I inquired was, what the attitude of the proposition was.

Mr. BLAIR. I may say to the Senator that there certainly is, for the Senate has just acted on a substitute, and on the principle that the justice of the peace hung a man, it can be done, parliamentary law or not. The Senator from Illinois moved a substitute, and his motion failing, I moved another substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. I have no objection to moving it as an amendment to strike out all after the word "provided" in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I put it in that form.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I stated—and it may be probably proper to repeat it—that the bill as reported contained a provision as to the amount and distribution of the pension, which is not in accord, I think I may say, with the views of the members of the committee, or a large majority of them, who desire a bill to pension all disabled and dependent soldiers.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me? He has made that assertion once before this afternoon. Now let me say to him that he is laboring under a misapprehension. This bill as offered in that regard is the same that was thoroughly discussed and passed in the Forty-eighth Congress. It was reintroduced and sent to the committee, printed, examined, acted upon, and reported in precisely this phraseology, and either the committee and the last Congress must have acted with extreme indifference or they must have known of this provision in the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I was not speaking of the committee of the Forty-eighth Congress. I was speaking of the committee of the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. It is the same, and the Senator was himself a member of the committee in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In both Congresses; and I never supposed a bill was to be reported here containing the provisions in this bill, and as soon as I discovered it I offered two or three amendments, one of which is now under consideration.

Now to show what is the intent and meaning, let me ask my friend from New Hampshire if it was in his contemplation or he thinks in the contemplation of the members of the committee that under this bill if a soldier lost his forefinger by an accident not the result of his own fault nor in the line of service, and was otherwise strong, able, vigorous, capable of earning his support by his labor, that person should go upon the pension-roll?

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that that man if he applied to the Department, like any other applicant for a pension, and proved that he had a disability—if the loss of the tip of his finger was a disability—he would be entitled under the bill to a corresponding rating, the highest for total inability to perform labor being $24. That was unquestionably the understanding of the committee, because such is the language of the bill and it is incapable of any other construction; but it must be found by the certificate of the examining board that the alleged disability constituted a disability to impair his capacity to earn his living. Whether it was such would be an open question. Doubtless the occupations of many are such that a disability of that sort would not disable in the earning of a living.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is right at that point exactly, I think I may say, that the members of the committee did not suppose they were authorizing a bill of that kind.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. With the bill just as it is in all other respects, the Senator comes in and makes a proposition that every one of these men who is paid anything shall be paid $8 a month.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely.

Mr. BLAIR. Does he wish the Senate to adopt a provision which shall give to a man with this insignificant hurt $8 a month instead of $1?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the Senator's proposition.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am not in favor of a bill that would give that man anything, nor was it supposed he was to go on the pension-roll.

Mr. BLAIR. If the man were disabled from getting his living, why not? That finger might be so sore as to disable the man.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then he would be pensionable.

Mr. BLAIR. Now, the fact to be found is the existence of a disability which disqualifies from getting a living in some degree. The Senator's supposition is based on his own logic.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That amendment asserts that a man can not be placed on the pension-roll at a dollar or two dollars.

Mr. BLAIR. Under existing law men may be.

Mr. VAN WYCK. And under this bill as reported that we are considering that man's disability might be weighed, measured to the extent of a dollar or two dollars.

Mr. BLAIR. The country has been legislating for a quarter of a century in just that way, and if there is anything in the nature of stupidity or impropriety in this proposed legislation the same is chargeable to all the legislation on the subject from the beginning. The table to which I have referred the Senator would be the best answer to his own question, and he will find it on the twenty-fifth page of the report of the present Commissioner of Pensions. There he will see that about one hundred and twenty-five thousand of the two hundred and forty-five thousand invalid pensioners at the present time under existing laws are rated at less than $8 a month, and some of them, twelve hundred and sixty, as low as $1 a month.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Those who are on the pension-roll at one, two, or three dollars per month are there for injuries received in the service and in the line of duty; and whether the soldier be rich or poor he becomes entitled to that pension, whatever it may be. It is a measure of damages, it is a legal claim against the Government, and no conditions are annexed to it. Those are the cases of the one hundred and twenty-five thousand to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator answer me, these men being entitled to justice, if it be justice to give them this little pension when they have contracted disability in the service, how is it justice to take another class whose disability, greater or less, was not contracted in the service at all, and pay them $8 a month even for the most trivial hurt? The Senator will find the language of this bill in the first section—

The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Now I will state what I suppose this bill was intended for and what I think three-fourths of the Committee on Pensions thought it was intended for, and what I suppose the country at large thinks it was intended for. By an injury in the course of service and in the line of duty the soldier becomes entitled to a pension as a legal claim without regard to whether he be rich or whether he be poor; but what this bill proposes now is a service pension, a service pension upon certain conditions, and I have never heard and the Senator, I think, has never heard of a bill for a service pension graduating the pension, neither has it been discriminated heretofore whether the recipient be rich or poor.

Mr. BLAIR. This is not a service pension; nothing of the kind. It is not offered as such.

Mr. VAN WYCK. When it was proposed at the last session that we should have a service pension, it was objected to that time had not sufficiently intervened between the end of the war and the date of the proposed bill, and we were referred to the soldiers of the Revolutionary war and to the soldiers of the war of 1812 to show how great a length of time had elapsed between those wars and the granting of the pensions, and hence it was proposed that there be a service pension here. The decrepit and disabled dependents of the other wars were not before our eyes. The nation appealed to us that the soldiers of the last war should not be allowed to end their days in poor-houses or in grinding organs on the street corners, and they said it was an outrage for this great nation to suffer the men who saved the integrity of the Republic and preserved the honor of the flag to endure that abasement, and that that spectacle should not be witnessed by the American people. We said yes, because the nation said so.

It is true my friend this morning said we forgot that in the plenitude of our power and our patriotism we said we were ready to vote the last man and the last dollar to save this Republic. We voted the "last man," but the "last dollar" is far off. We said that this spectacle was an outrage in the eyes of the nation, and we agreed that our dependent soldiers, those who are compelled to labor for bread and have no other means of support, should at least be taken care of, and we supposed we were meeting that call in this bill.

Now, my friend thinks I am not consistent. Let me see. I proposed, first, that any soldier who was disabled from furnishing his own support, if he was dependent upon that support for his bread, should be placed upon the pension-roll to the extent as I supposed of $8 per month. There was no grading of disability. Does any gentleman expect to get exact justice? My desire was that the bounty of this Government, that the justice of this Government should extend to the largest number and do the most good, and the object was first to gather in those who were sorrowful as they were to contemplate, who are the objects of the nation's bounty and the nation's charity, and to extend it no further.

If that be so then to share the bounties of this bill, as I supposed, there was to be a total incapacity to work enough to procure bread for subsistence; and hence if the soldier could work one-fourth of his time, and that one-fourth was not enough to procure his daily bread, it was a case of total incapacity. If the incapacity was to earn enough to support life it should be considered total.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him a questson?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. If I understand the effect of his amendment, it is that for the soldier's disability the soldier shall receive a pension of $8, no matter how slight the disability. The pension, if allowed at all, shall not be allowed for less than $8. Am I correct in that?

Mr. VAN WYCK. You are correct if the remaining part of the bill stands as it is.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that the object of the Senator?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir. My object is that no man shall be placed on the pension-roll at $8 a month unless he is incapacitated to earn enough to support life.

Mr. HARRIS. The question I want to get at is this: If for a very trifling disability the Senator would give a soldier a pension of $8, if another soldier presented himself equally meritorious, disabled to a degree three or four times as much, would he think it fair to give these two soldiers the same amount of pension, or would he not give the latter soldier three or four times as much as he gives the former?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would not think that fair, and that was precisely what I was going to illustrate. I would think it fair if the injury was in the service and in the line of duty because the Government then I suppose would pay for the injury received, and that injury is different whether it be the loss of the small finger of the whole arm, or whether the injury be here or there [illustrating], or whether it be the leg below or above the knee or at the hip. That is an actual claim against the Government for which the Government pays to the extent of the damage. That is one point; but this bill is not that. This bill is a service pension, a gift, a charity if you please, given for the purpose of relieving the nation from the exhibition of its dependent and disabled soldiers begging at the street-corners, dying in the workhouses, and being buried in pine boxes at the expense of the counties.

I hope the Senator will at once see my point, that no one shall go on this pension-roll unless he is disabled to the extent of incapacity to earn his livelihood, and when he gets there it is to the extent of total incapacity. Suppose a man be wrecked in a railroad car and has his arm taken off. If that injury had been received in the line of duty he would have been graded up possibly as high as $72. We do not propose to grade him up there under this bill. Twenty-four dollars is the highest. If he is wrecked almost beyond recognition but still lives, that is total incapacity to earn his bread. Then if he depends on his labor for that bread, he is placed on the pension-roll. Here you come down and down to lower cases.

A man, if you please, comparatively enjoying life is suffering from nervous prostration who evidently can not go into the field and earn his bread by his labor. That amounts to total incapacity; and when you give that man $24 and the other wreck $24, there is not any justice in that if you base it on justice. This man can feed himself, he can move around and enjoy the society of friends and progress in locomotion. Another man has his arm so far off that when he exercises he is prostrated and can not do anything, but he can feed himself. That is total incapacity; but it does not compare with the wreck or even the man with nervous prostration, and yet you give none of them beyond $24 by this bill.

I suppose this bill is for the greatest good to the greatest number. It applies to those who are disabled to the extent of inability to work, and I did not suppose it contemplated that when you got below total incapacity, where a man was unable to earn his livelihood, where his injury was so trivial that it did not interfere with him, such a man was to be a recipient of bounty.

Mr. President, as I stated before, if we are to do anything for these men who do need relief, let Congress give them a fixed sum in order to enable them to live, because that is all they have asked for, that we relieve these soldiers from the weight of poverty and disability resting upon them so that they may to a reasonable extent enjoy the comforts of life. To reach that we want to do as we do with all other pension bills. We only make two conditions which can be easily ascertained, first that the soldiers are dependent, and next that they are unable to work so as to obtain the necessaries of life.

Now, what is proposed? You propose to grade them as I understand, so that for any disability from the lowest to the highest the Pension Office, as is now the case, shall draw distinctions. They are to be examined with the same care that they are now, and three-fourths of the cases, particularly if sympathy is not with the soldier, will be adjudged so adversely as to create discontent and dissatisfaction. Three-fourths of these cases, or one-half of them at any rate, will be appealed from the Pension Office to the Congress of the United States; and then here this little committee, which handles probably three thousand cases in a year, will have its work increased three or four times. I think it ought to be considered that the object of this bill is to furnish the greatest quantity of relief to the greatest number of persons. I would have the allowance fixed at a certain rate. You want to relieve the old soldiers. They are all getting old. Such a man has a difficulty in the Pension Office and he appeals to Congress. All pension departments soon get in antagonism to claimants. They begin to think, or at least they act as if they thought, that every soldier is a fraud. We have seen that in our committee; we have seen cases upon cases of that kind. I speak of the Department itself; not within the last year or the last two years, but years ago. Antagonisms naturally grow up and they look with suspicion upon the soldiers' claims.

I have taken the position I have in this matter because I have believed that it would do the most good. If we are to measure the disabilities of men as they have been measured I fear there will be great discontent necessarily in the minds of the soldiers. Even my friend from New Hampshire admits that. He has himself denounced, I think, this system of measuring the extent and value of the disability. My friend insists that that is wrong, and he himself is willing that all that class, amounting to one hundred and twenty-five thousand, shall be placed on the pension-roll at a fixed rate and put at $4 per month.

Mr. BLAIR. No; there is no such number as that. There is a trifling number below $4.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No matter what the number. My friend's position to-day is that those who have been measured below $4 shall be raised to $4. Now he proposes by this bill to continue this measuring process, scaling down by the Pension Department, so that injustice and wrong will be measured out to the soldier to whom you propose to send relief. You denounce this scaling and measuring process, and yet you leave it in this bill precisely as it has been in the past.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senator will not undertake to attribute to me any criticism upon the bill or the general law which I did not make. I do not wish it to be understood that his remarks are applicable to me.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BUTLER. Before that motion is put, I wish to submit an amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. BUTLER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

After section 3 add as a new section:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the names of all the surviving officers, soldiers, and sailors who enlisted and served in the war with Mexico for any period during the years 1845, 1846, 1847, and 1848, and were honorably discharged, and their surviving widows, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the passage of this act, during their lives. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry this act into effect: Provided, That where it shall appear that a discharge is lost, secondary evidence may be permitted; and where it shall appear an applicant has received a land warrant, that shall be sufficient evidence of an honorable discharge, unless the evidence shows that he procured it by fraud: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to persons under political disabilities."

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 8762) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for public printing, pensions, and pay of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SPRINGFIELD PORT OF DELIVERY—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1397, entitled "An act to establish a port of delivery at Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts."

It appears that the best reasons urged for the passage of this bill are that Springfield has a population of about 40,000; that the imports to the section of country where the city is located for the last year amounted in value to nearly $3,000,000, and that the importers at this point labored under a disadvantage in being obliged to go to New York and Boston to clear their goods, which are frequently greatly delayed.

The Government is now subjected to great loss of revenue through the intricacies of the present system relating to the collection of customs dues and through the frauds and evasions which that system permits and invites. It is also the cause of much of the delay and vexation to which the honest importer is subjected. I am of the opinion that the reforms of present methods which have been lately earnestly pressed upon Congress should be inaugurated instead of increasing the number of ports where present evils may be further extended.

The bill now under consideration provides that a surveyor of customs shall be appointed to reside at said port, who shall receive a salary not to exceed $1,000 per annum.

It is quite obvious that an experienced force of employés at the ports where goods for Springfield are entered would be much better qualified to adjust the duties upon the same than the person thus proposed to be added to the vast army of Federal officials.

There are many cities in the different States having larger populations than Springfield and fully as much entitled upon every ground presented to the advantages sought by this bill; and yet it is clear that the following of the precedent which the proposed legislation would establish could not fail to produce confusion and uncertainty in the adjustment of customs duties, leading to irritating discriminations and probable loss to the Government.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 17, 1886.

Mr. DAWES. I move that that message be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ALASKA FRONTIER LINE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

With reference to the paragraph in my annual message to Congress in which I called attention to the uncertainty that exists as to the location of the frontier line between Alaska and British Columbia as defined by the treaty of cession with Russia of March 30, 1867, I now transmit herewith for the information and consideration of Congress a report of the Secretary of State upon the subject, with accompanying papers.

In view of the importance of the subject I recommend that provision be made by law for a preliminary survey of the boundary line in question by officers of the United States, in order that the information necessary for the basis of a treaty between this country and Great Britain for the establishment of a definite boundary line may be obtained; and I also recommend that the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated for the expenses of making such survey.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, May 17, 1886.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and be printed.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me that the message ought to go to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps it ought to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but I do not ask that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be printed and lie on the table for further determination of the question of reference.

Mr. MANDERSON. My attention is called to the fact that in one of the communications from the President—I think that in reference to the boundary line of the Territory of Alaska—there is an accompanying map. It seems to me the printing of that map, which would be a matter of expense, had better be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8762) making appropriations to supply deficiences in the appropriations for public printing, pensions, and pay of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to report the bill appropriating money for the Military Academy. I desire to have it considered at this time. It will take but a moment. There are no amendments to the House bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I have moved an executive session. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] informs me that he had not entirely finished his remarks, but he gives way to my motion.

Mr. LOGAN. It will not take ten minutes to dispose of this bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Report it to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. I had the impression heretofore that appropriation bills had the right of way.

Mr. CAMERON. My motion was made before the Senator interfered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question in on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned to to-morrow, Tuesday, May 18, at 12 m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 72, noes 70.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If this motion prevails will that prevent us from going ahead with the regular order for Monday's business?

The SPEAKER. As long as the consideration of the appropriation bill shall be continued by the House it would prevent the consideration of other business to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that this appropriation bill ought to be immediately considered and passed. It makes provision among other things for printing the RECORD; and meet pension deficencies; also to pay the Army. It will not take any length of time, in all human probability.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire if there is to be any general debate, or if it is to be passed speedily?

Mr. RANDALL. That is a matter to be regulated by the House. Whatever debate is necessary to explain fully the terms of the bill will be allowed; but so far as the committee are concerned there is no desire to debate the bill.

The SPEAKER. Tellers being ordered, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. O'DONNELL, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. ADAMS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 85.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I hope it will be understood [cries of "Regular order!"] that this is against temperance legislation. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Maine will be allowed to make his statement, but coupled with the condition that an opportunity is given for a reply. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. REED, of Maine. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. How does this motion become in order? This is suspension day.

The SPEAKER. The day is not set apart exclusively for suspensions. It is simply in order to move to suspend the rules to-day; but the gentleman from New York, before the Chair had proceeded to call the committees, rose and made the motion, which is also in order.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I never heard it made on suspension day before.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There were several recognitions to-day before the regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 105, not voting 98; as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill which will now be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8762) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for public printing, pensions, and pay of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the objects hereinafter expressed for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, namely:

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving for both Houses of Congress, the Department of State, and the Treasury Department, including salaries or compensation of all necessary clerks and employés, for labor (by the day, piece, or contract), and for all the necessary materials which may be needed in the prosecution of the work, $229,000; and from the said sum hereby appropriated printing and binding may be done by the Public Printer to the amounts following, respectively, namely:

For printing and binding for Congress, including the proceedings and debates, $200,000; for the State Department, $5,000; for the Treasury Department, $24,000.

PENSIONS.

For Army and Navy pensions as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, and survivors and widows of the war of 1812, $6,000,000: Provided, That the appropriations aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: And provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

That so much of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for pay of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, as may be required, not to exceed $200,000, is hereby reappropriated and made available to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for pay of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886.

NOTE.—Amount appropriated by this bill, $6,229,000.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I call for the reading of the report. It is very short, and explains the reasons why this bill is brought before the House at this time.

The report (by Mr. ADAMS, of New York) was read, as follows:

In presenting the accompanying bill providing for certain deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1886, and which are urgent, the Committee on Appropriations submit the following in explanation thereof:

The bill is based upon estimates submitted in House Ex. Docs. 86, 162, 176, 192, and 222, and upon representations from the various heads of the Departments that the amounts recommended are urgently and immediately necessary to aid in completing the service of the Government for the current fiscal year. The amounts recommended are for purposes as follows:

For public printing	$229,000
For pensions	6,000,000
	6,229,000

Provision is also made for the transfer of an unexpended balance of $200,000 from the appropriation for pay of the Army for 1885, to meet a deficiency for pay of the Army for 1886.

In addition to the reasons given in the executive documents above mentioned for the immediate appropriation of the sums named, attention is called to the letters of the Secretary of State, Public Printer, Commissioner of Pensions, and Paymaster-General, which are made a part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 8, 1886.

SIR: Referring to my letter of the 26th ultimo, requesting an additional sum of $5,000 to cover expenses of printing and binding for this Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, I have the honor to repeat that the work now in the hands of the Public Printer is of such importance as to require immediate attention, and unless prompt action is taken by Congress to provide the amount necessary to complete the work for the fiscal year the public service will suffer.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER, Washington, D. C., May 3, 1886.

SIR: I regret to inform you, as intimated in my last annual report, that it will be necessary to appropriate not less than $200,000 to continue the operations of this office, including the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, during the remainder of the fiscal year.

This action is necessary because of the reduction of the appropriation for the present fiscal year of $250,000 by Congress without a corresponding reduction of orders for printing.

In order to avoid a furlough, and the suspension of the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the discontinuance of all work except such as was provided for by special appropriations, this appropriation should be available not later than the 25th instant.

Very respectfully,

S. P. ROUNDS, Public Printer.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER, Washington, D. C., May 3, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In preparing my estimate for the amount of appropriation required for the use of the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1885, and closing June 30, 1886, it was necessary first to take into consideration the actual amount expended during the previous year, the average annual increase of the business of the office, and the fact that the new estimate would also have to provide for a long session of Congress, which included nearly four months' extra expenditure for printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from March 4 to June 30, as well as a large quantity of extra Congressional work, such as bills, reports, &c., and such other extra expenditures as would naturally have to be provided for during the long session.

The following appropriations will indicate what has been heretofore provided:

For 1883, short session	$2,377,650
For 1884, long session	2,500,000
For 1885, short session	2,250,000
For 1886, long session	2,250,000

The House of Representatives reduced the amount to the sum of $2,000,000. At this time I was called before the Senate Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of giving them such information as they desired upon the subject, and I also addressed the chairman of the committee the following letter:

"OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER, Washington, D. C., March 3, 1885.

"DEAR SIR: Please let me urge the committee to insist upon the $2,500,000 appropriation. If less is appropriated for the long session, in my judgment a deficiency will be necessary. There is plenty of work to be done.

"I have never asked for a deficiency, and if the Senate will insist upon its amendments the good record I have endeavored to make will not be broken the coming year.

"Very respectfully,

"Hon. W. B. ALLISON,
"Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate."

The Senate amended the bill by increasing the appropriation to $2,500,000, the same amount as was appropriated for the previous long session, but the conference committee reduced it to $2,250,000 ($426,107 less than the estimates), or the same sum that was appropriated for the previous fiscal year, which had only the short session of Congress.

This office has never, during my administration, found it necessary to ask for any deficiency, although its yearly increasing business has been promptly and satisfactorily done, and its machinery and facilities increased out of its regular appropriation; but judging from the general increase of business and having to provide for the large extra expenditure of a long session of Congress, I stated, in my annual report, that in my judgment, with a reduced appropriation, a deficiency bill would become necessary.

And I regret to say that although the expenses of the office have been kept at as low a figure as was possible, considering the largely increased expense of the long session, and the great excess of printing ordered by Congress over that of previous years, I find that this office will require an additional appropriation in order to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, complete the work ordered by Congress, and carry it to the close of this fiscal year.

I have made a careful computation of the work in hand, and what I believe to be a correct estimate of the amount needed is $200,000 (required for the pay-rolls and the necessary materials for the month, which added to the amount of the appropriation will be $50,000 less than was appropriated for the last long session), and I would respectfully but urgently ask the Joint Committee on Printing to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the matter, and request that immediate steps be taken to provide it in season for use not later than the 25th instant, as if not available at that date I shall, under the law, be compelled to suspend all further work, including the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, except such as is provided for by special appropriation.

It may be proper for me to state that from the meeting of Congress in December last up to date it has ordered very much more work than ever before during the same period of time—as, for instance, the number of bills and resolutions printed to April 30 was 13,770, as against 10,761 up to the same date at the previous long session, the number of documents being 9,735, as against 7,874 during the same period, and other work in proportion.

The extra cost of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for this (the long) session over the short one, from March 4 to June 30, based upon its cost to the present time, will be, say, $60,000.

Had the appropriation for the present fiscal year been in proportion to that of the previous year, or had the amount estimated for been appropriated, or, after the reduction of the appropriation, had Congress made a corresponding reduction in orders for printing, it would not now be my unpleasant duty to urge upon the committee the importance of having this additional amount available for use by the 25th instant, so as not to be obliged to cut down the force or suspend the business of the office, which would amount, in fact, to blocking the wheels of Congress and every Department of the Government.

Any further information desired by the committee I will be very glad to furnish promptly.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. P. ROUNDS, Public Printer.

Hon. E. BARKSDALE,
Chairman Committee on Printing.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE.
Washington, D. C., May 13, 1886.

SIR: In connection with the interview had this morning with the subcommittee on deficiencies of the Committee on Appropriations, on the subject of the deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the present fiscal year, I have the honor to submit the following statement:

On the 8th day of May, instant, there was to the credit of this appropriation in the Treasury, as shown by the records of this office, available for the payment of Army pensions (including $53,884.77, pay and allowances, and $13,264.85, examining surgeons' fees), $5,674,206.76.

On the same day there was in the hands of the several United States pension agents, $2,576,804.08, making a total available of $8,251,010.84.

During the month of March last there was paid out for Army pensions for the quarter ending on the 4th day of that month, the sum of $11,251,543.80.

Since that date the pension-roll has continued to increase, and it is estimated that a sum not less than $12,750,000 will be required to meet the payments due June 4 next, which will be made prior to the expiration of the fiscal year, and it may not be improper to add that the experiences of this office is that the payments for the month of June are always largely in excess of those for any preceding month of a fiscal year.

There will therefore result in the appropriation for the payment of Army pensions a deficiency amounting to $4,498,989.16. In addition to this deficiency the sum of $1,000,000 will also be required to pay the increase provided by the act of Congress approved March 19, 1886, increasing the pension of widows, minors, and dependent relatives.

In explanation of this amount, it may be proper to state that there are ninety-nine thousand pensioners now on the rolls whose rates have been increased by this law, and that the increase in each case to June 4 next will be $10. This will make $900,000, and the additional $100,000 will be required to make final payments and in the settlement of claims to reimbursement by the accounting officers of the Treasury under section 4718 of the Revised Statutes.

The attention of the committee has been heretofore called to the necessity of providing for these deficiencies. I have the honor to request, therefore, that the sum of $6,000,000 be appropriated for the purposes stated, and that the action be speedily taken, so that the money shall be available not later than the 30th instant, as unless the money be appropriated without delay the appropriation will be exhausted in a few days after the 4th of next June, and the payment of all pensions will, as a consequence, terminate until the appropriation for the next fiscal year shall become available.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. BLACK, Commissioner.

Hon. CHAIRMAN SUBCOMMITTEE ON DEFICIENCIES OF COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS, House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, PAYMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 10, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to a letter from this office dated April 20, 1886, submitting to the Secretary of War an estimate of the amount that will be required to supply a deficiency in the amount appropriated for pay, &c., of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886.

As the balance now available for distribution will not be sufficient to complete the payment of the Army to June 30, it will be necessary, unless the funds requested are in the hands of the paymasters on or before that date, to direct that the payments on the muster of June 30 be suspended until the appropriation is made, or to make partial payment thereon.

It is very desirable, for reasons that will suggest themselves, that either of the above contingencies should be avoided. I would therefore respectfully urge as prompt action as possible in the matter.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. B. ROCHESTER,
Paymaster-General, U. S. Army.

Hon S. J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 43 insert the following:

"Treasury Department:

"To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer from the appropriation for contingent expenses Treasury Department, fuel, &c., 1886, a sum not exceeding $4,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for contingent expenses Treasury Department, gas, &c., 1886."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that until general debate is closed amendments will not be in order.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that all debate be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all general debate on the bill be closed, and that the committee proceed to consider it under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I now offer the amendment which I sent up a few moments ago.

The amendment was again read, and was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House as amended.

Mr. TAULBEE. Before that is done I would like to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill. I would like to know if this bill appropriates any money to pay for the printing of the Agricultural Reports for 1883 and 1884.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. It does not. I understand the printing of those reports is provided for by special appropriations.

Mr. HATCH. It is.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, the Commissioner of Pensions is better advised than I am as to the necessity for this deficiency appropriation, and I do not question the propriety of it. In the annual report of the Commissioner he states that the amount paid for pensions during the fiscal year 1885 was $64,933,288, while the statement of the Treasury Department shows the amount to be $56,102,267. I assume that this discrepancy can be explained, but no explanation appears in the report of the Commissioner or in the Treasury statement, and there ought to be some explanation by the Committee on Pensions. If only the smaller sum, $56,000,000, was paid last year, there has been no such increase of the pension-list as would require the additional sum asked for deficiencies in this. The appropriation for this year already made is $60,000,000, and adding this $6,000,000 would make a total of $10,000,000 above the payment of last year, as appears from the Treasury statement, only one million of which results from the increase of widows' pensions. If only the amount shown by the Treasury statement was paid out, instead of requiring an additional sum of six millions, or five millions, only a small portion of that amount will be needed, and we shall have a considerable balance. That, of course, will not hurt us; but I do not see the propriety of making the appropriation larger than is needed to meet the necessities of the case. The end of this first full fiscal year under the present administration will show a very considerable reduction of national expenditure over the last year even with increased expenditures for pensions. It will show several millions addition to the receipts over last year, showing general frugal management.

Mr. RANDALL. The appropriation for the fiscal year 1886 was $60,000,000, and I take it for granted that that amount has been drawn by warrant by the Commissioner of Pensions, and that the amounts which appear as expenditures are the amounts shown by the final settlement with the pension agents as they stand upon the books of the Treasury. That is the only explanation I can give of the discrepancy. I have always thought that there ought to be closer correspondence in accounts between the Commissioner of Pensions and the Treasury Department in the particulars indicated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. What is the actual difference?

Mr. RANDALL. It would be $12,000,000, including this deficiency; but when you come to look at the report of the Third Auditor you can see very plainly why these deficiencies of appropriations are required. He states that the rate of increase of pensions continues, and that since the 1st of April, 1885, there have been not less than forty thousand names added to the roll of pensioners. On the other hand, there have been a great many names taken off the roll—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] I believe has heretofore indicated the number.

Mr. MORRISON. About fifteen thousand.

Mr. RANDALL. There have been about forty thousand added to the roll and about fifteen thousand taken from it, so that the net increase is about twenty-five thousand. The Third Auditor, in his very able report, for which, as indicating the manner of the conduct of his office, I desire publicly to thank him here, further says:

During the past month over eight thousand reports were received at the office from the Commissioner of Pensions, the largest number known in the history of the office.

These are the reasons, I take it, which have occasioned this deficiency. The Congress at its last session gave the full amount asked for, $60,000,000.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I am not questioning the propriety of this deficiency, but I would like to be able to understand the propriety of a $10,000,000 discrepancy between the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Treasury statement. If that were fully understood we could better judge of the probable amount of the deficiency.

Mr. RANDALL. I can account for it in no other way than as I have stated. I agree, Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that there is no inexplicable procedure about the matter. Anything that is in excess is covered into the Treasury. If the pension agents at the end of the year have money on hand which has not been expended it goes back into the Treasury.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the manner in which the pension money is disbursed will furnish an explanation of this seeming discrepancy. The Commissioner of Pensions, in the first place, draws his warrants upon the Treasury for the amount in gross, and the money is placed to the credit of the pension agents throughout the country. Those agents place the funds in the national banks which are designated as depositories of the United States. That money represents the amount which the allowances of the Commissioner of Pensions call for. When the pension agents in the various localities make their disbursements to the pensioners they take vouchers, which show the amounts that they have actually paid out. Those vouchers are then sent to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, and he examines all the details of the disbursements by the pension agents, and finally determines how much of the money has reached the hands of the pensioners themselves; and between the time of the making of the allowances by the Commissioner of Pensions and the time when the accounts of the agents are finally adjusted this discrepancy appears. That is the explanation.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, that is an explanation which does not explain. The Treasury officials state that they have paid out $56,000,000 for this purpose. The gentleman's explanation would show that the officials of the Pension Office have paid out more. I do not see how they can pay more than they get from the Treasury. They have no money except that drawn from the Treasury, the amount of the Treasury warrants.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Sergeant-at-Arms of this House draws the money for the pay of the members of the House for the month, but his account is not settled until he turns in the vouchers which he has received from members, and between the time when he draws the amount in gross and the time of making his final settlement there will appear a discrepancy between his account and the Treasury account.

Mr. CANNON. I apprehend also, Mr. Chairman, that the Third Auditor's statement is deferred not only until the vouchers are returned, but until they are examined and approved.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is what he states. His statement is not made until the vouchers have been turned over to the Treasury Department and examined and approved.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to inquire whether the committee are informed as to the cause of the great increase in the number of pensions at this late period after the close of the war.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose the reason is to be found in difficulties which have delayed the settlement of cases, and in the fact that as the soldiers of the late war grow older they feel greater necessity for applying to the Government for help. I think that in general claimants are now prosecuting their claims with greater anxiety and energy by reason of their greater physical necessities.

Mr. LAIRD (in an undertone) addressed a question to Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not sought to draw any discrimination in this matter between the late administration and the present administration.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Can the gentleman inform us whether the number of new filings is greater now than in previous years?

Mr. RANDALL. The Third Auditor states that there continues to be a rapid increase in the number of allowances.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman how it could be otherwise when for four years past the Pension Office has been working twice and a half as much force as it did, both in the field and in the office. In this way proofs have been accumulating from year to year, thus putting claims in a shape for final action, so that within a year or two past claims have been adjudicated and disposed of more rapidly than they were.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not true that within the last four years there has been a great deal of general legislation which has removed objections to claims already filed?

Mr. RANDALL. I think there has been very little legislation of that sort. At some other time when the consideration of the question will not obstruct other matters of legislation I would be glad to enter fully into a discussion as to the causes which have induced a more rapid payment of pensions by the present Commissioner than by the former.

Mr. LAIRD. Will this appropriation for printing permit the publication of the deferred report from the Bureau of Animal Industry?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAIRD. That document is much needed in our country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS] that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8762) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for public printing, pensions, and pay of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, directed him to report the same back as amended with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I call for the previous question upon the amendment and on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. COWLES. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 4 voting in favor thereof.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 94, noes 4.

Mr. COWLES. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COWLES, and Mr. ADAMS, of New York, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 163, noes 5.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. This being the third Monday of the month, the Chair will proceed to call the committees for motions to suspend the rules. The call rests with the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, a month ago, when the Committee on Pacific Railroads was called, I moved, by direction of the committee, to suspend the rules and pass House bill No. 6667, a bill providing for the collection of certain fees from the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. By direction of the committee I now withdraw that motion, and move to suspend the rules so as to adopt a resolution which has been reported from the committee and is now on the Calendar. I ask that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. On the third Monday of last month the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], by direction of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, moved to suspend the rules and pass a certain bill. A second was demanded, but before it was ordered by the House an adjournment took place. The gentleman now, by direction of the committee, as the Chair understands——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Withdraws that motion, which in fact is not yet before the House and could not be until seconded, and moves to suspend the rules so as to adopt the resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 5th, and Tuesday, the 8th days of June, 1886, immediately after the morning hours, be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills, nor with prior orders, nor with the consideration of reports from the Committee on the Public Lands under the special order; and if the consideration of such business be displaced, then the next days not previously set apart shall be devoted to the consideration of the same until it shall be disposed of, or until two days shall hav e been consumed, subject to the above-mentioned interference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee for his own information, and especially with reference to action hereafter, what is meant in this resolution by the phrase "morning hours." There is but one morning hour under the rules.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The resolution should read "morning hour," not "morning hours."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, then, does not intend to allow on the days designated the hour for the consideration of bills.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; that was not intended.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was it not the intention of the committee to allow the consideration hour on those days?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The resolution reads just as the committee agreed to it, except that the word should be "hour" instead of "hours."

The SPEAKER. The resolution in the hands of the Clerk reads "hours." The correction will be made. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes; I demand a second.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. MORRISON and Mr. RICHARDSON.

Mr. CRISP. Will gentlemen agree to a second being demanded?

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to object to doing away with the second morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not now debatable. If there be no objection the second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the motion and fifteen minutes in opposition to it. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will be recognized to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. DUNHAM. You ought to except the morning hour from your motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not desire to take up the time of the House in discussing the resolution. I do not think there will be any objection to it. I wish to state, however, that there are a number of measures of considerable importance to the country pending before the House which have been reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman be kind enough to indicate them?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will do so with pleasure. One of the measures to be presented—I am authorized by the committee to say—will be the one I brought to the attention of the House on the 3d day of April last, the bill (H. R. 6667) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget's Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," requiring said Northern Pacific Railroad Company to pay the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying the lands granted to said railroad. It will involve about $1,300,000.

It is unnecessary, Mr. Speaker, for me to take up the time of the House by explaining what is meant by that bill. It has been already done upon a previous occasion in this House.

One of the other measures which will be presented will be a joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission of experts to investigate these companies as to the methods of the system of Pacific railroads which have been aided by subsidy bonds and grants of land. It includes all the railroads embraced in that system.

Another one of the measures which will be considered, being bill of the House No. 8318, is one of great interest to the country, and involving the entire system of railroads aided with subsidy bonds by the Government. It has been deemed essential by the committee some legislation should be had looking to the interest of the Government. The indebtedness already from these railroads to the Government amounts to something over $100,000,000, and under the Thurman act, as gentlemen know, it is gradually increasing year by year and every year.

Mr. OATES. Does the gentleman mean the railroads which have received grants from the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The joint resolution I mention refers to the entire system of Pacific railroads.

Mr. OATES. You mean the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I mean the investigation provided for in the joint resolution relative to the Union Pacific Railroad and the Central Pacific Railroad and all their branches, and the Northern Pacific Railroad, which has received land but not bonds.

Mr. OATES. If you investigate the Northern Pacific, why not investigate every other one?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We have nothing to do with any but the Pacific railroads, and therefore we do not propose to investigate all the railroads in the country. It is simply the Pacific railroads we now speak of.

Mr. OATES. There are others than those you have named.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It embraces all which have received aid from the Government in bonds or lands.

We have a number of other measures of not so much importance—chartering railroads through some of the Territories and giving permission to some of the Pacific railroads to make "running arrangements" and other business arrangements with certain other railroad lines.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I should be content to submit the question to the House without a word, but the action of the Committee on the Pacific railroads, in some quarters and for some purpose, has been grossly misrepresented. Therefore while I know here and now is not the proper time to discuss on their merits the bills reported by that committee, yet I take this opportunity to put on record in a few words the substance of the important measure looking to the settlement of the great debt due the Government by these Pacific railroads.

As is well known to the House, in 1862 an act was passed granting to certain corporations charters to build railroads from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and granting to them large tracts of land, and also giving them bonds of the United States—subsidy bonds, of so much a mile—in some parts of the road $16,000 a mile, in some parts $32,000 a mile, and in other parts $48,000 a mile. By that act, to secure the Government from loss, a lien was created on all the property of the roads in favor of the United States. In 1864 the Government waived its first lien and allowed these railroad companies to issue bonds of a like amount, which should have priority over those bonds which the Government gave to aid in building the roads—in other words, agreed that the bonds issued by the companies should have a first lien and the bonds issued by the United States for the benefit of such roads should be subordinate thereto.

It was thought, Mr. Speaker, at the time of the passage of the act of 1864 that one-half of the transportation account of the Government would be sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds, and that 5 per cent. of the net income, which was required to be paid annually into the sinking fund, would at the maturity of the bonds enable us to have a fund in the Treasury sufficient to pay them.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Was that stated in the debate?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir; it was so stated in the debate upon the passage of the act, and we have retained each year one-half of the amount due these railroads for transportation of the mails, troops, &c.

We can not always foresee results, although we may be ever so careful in devising and formulating a plan which we think will accomplish a certain object. The 5 per cent. which it was thought would enable the Government to accumulate a fund with which to pay the bonds at maturity has proven wholly inadequate for that purpose. Indeed, looking to the whole indebtedness of the companies, the sinking fund is trifling and insignificant.

One-half of the transportation account that was supposed to be sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds—they are 6 per cent. bonds, without option of redemption before maturity——

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. What is the aggregate amount of the bonds?

Mr. CRISP. They amount to $64,623,512. I say that so far from one-half of the transportation account being sufficient to pay the interest upon the bonds, the Government is paying out, and has been paying out for years, in addition to the one-half transportation account, $1,600,000 a year as interest on the bonds loaned these railroads. These bonds are due and will have to be paid by the Government in 1898.

Mr. LAIRD. Eighteen hundred and ninety-four, is it not?

Mr. CRISP. No; 1898—twelve years from now. We are adding to the debt that the railroads owe us annually a large amount, and they owe us now, Mr. Speaker, a net debt (after deducting all amounts now in the sinking fund, after deducting every claim they have against the Government) of $102,834,794.

That debt will not be due until 1898. It draws no interest, and we are adding to it under the present law at the rate of $1,610,785.93 every year.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Over and above the amount received by the sinking fund from all sources?

Mr. CRISP. Over and above all receipts of the Government from the roads, sinking fund included. In 1898 the debt that they will owe to us—under the present law—will be about $128,500,000.

Mr. LAIRD. That is in 1898?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir. There are now outstanding——

Mr. SOWDEN. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRISP. Let me finish this sentence.

Mr. SOWDEN. I wish to ask a question for my own information. I understand you to say that they will owe the Government about $102,000,000 in 1898?

Mr. CRISP. They owe that now.

Mr. SOWDEN. Is it collectible and payable now?

Mr. CRISP. It is not collectible and payable now, but that is the sum of their indebtedness now, due in the future.

Mr. SOWDEN. Then how can they owe the debt unless it is due and payable?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is a stickler for words, while I am trying to inform the House of the substance of the indebtedness of these corporations. A man or company may be indebted, although the debt is not due.

In 1898, I repeat, the indebtedness to the Government will have reached one hundred and twenty-eight and a half millions of dollars. Then that amount of money will be due and payable. Before they can pay us, however, it must be remembered that they have an outstanding debt of their own, which is a prior lien to ours, upon the same property, which, added to our debt, will make the sum of the indebtedness approximately $193,000,000. Let me give you the figures. The United States has paid as interest on subsidy bonds $63,099,504.18. Total credits of the several companies, half transportation accounts, &c., $18,804,122.28, leaving unpaid balance of interest $44,295,381.90. This added to principal of bonds, $64,623,512, makes $108,918,893.30. Deduct from this $6,084,099.82, amount in sinking fund, leaves balance due United States July 1, 1884, $102,834,794.08. The annual interest paid by the United States on the subsidy bonds is $3,877,410.72. The average annual repayment by the companies has been $2,266,624.79, showing an average annual increase of the debt of $1,610,785.93. Of the $2,266,624.79 average annual payment, $1,013,016.64 is carried to the sinking fund, which bears interest in favor of the companies, and only $1,253,608.15 is actually paid into our Treasury on interest account; we therefore advance annually to these companies in interest an average of $2,623,802.57 in excess of repayment of interest by them. The first-mortgage bonds of these companies amount to $64,613,000. They will owe us in 1898 about $128,500,000; this makes $193,000,000.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. How much is the property worth?

Mr. CRISP. The property, from the best information the committee can obtain, could be built to-day for one-half of the amount of the indebtedness.

Mr. LAIRD. What is it worth now?

Mr. CRISP. I was saying that from the best information the committee has been able to get the property could be built to-day for one-half of the $193,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question arises, What is to be done?

Mr. BAYNE. When do the bonds—not the Government indorsed bonds—fall due?

Mr. CRISP. They fall due at the same time. They are identical; for the act of Congress of 1864 allowed them to issue a like amount, due at a like time with the bonds on which we were indorsers, and gave those bonds priority of lien.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Have they not kept the interest on these bonds to which you now refer paid up?

Mr. CRISP. On their own bonds they have paid the interest. If there had been a default upon their own bonds what would have been the result? The railroad franchises would have been sold, and if they only brought enough to pay the first-mortgage lien, which is understood to be the full value of the property, the Government of the United States would have literally nothing—no security whatever upon which to realize this vast sum of $128,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for many years there have been suggestions and propositions looking to the protection of the interests of the Government in these great corporations. In 1878 what was known as the Thurman act was passed, by the terms of which the amount to be paid into the sinking fund was increased from 5 per cent. to 25 per cent., and which increase it was supposed would furnish some protection to the Government. That expectation has not been realized. By reason of the building of competing lines of railroad the receipts of these great corporations have fallen off, competition having cut them down; and while there has been a great increase in the amount of the percentage of the net income required to be paid into the sinking fund, it does not make a great increase in the number of dollars that go into that fund. Something must be done to protect the Government. And now I wish to say a word upon the proposition submitted by the committee.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I desire to ask the gentleman this question. It was provided as to this 25 per cent. which should go into the sinking fund that its payment was dependent upon their ability first to pay the interest on the prior bonds. If they paid that interest, and we realized the 25 per cent. on the sinking fund——

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. MORRISON. All the time I have.

Mr. CRISP. I thank the gentleman from Illinois very much, because I want the House and the country to understand the character of the bill brought in by the committee. We are confronted, then, with this condition of things, that this debt is increasing $1,600,000 every year; that we never get a dollar of interest on what we pay out for these companies; that they already owe us, or that the amount we have paid out for them, is now $102,000,000 over and above what we have received; and that this debt is increasing at such a rate that it will be $128,000,000 in 1898; and the property of the companies to be of sufficient value to secure our debt must be worth in the market $193,000,000. We may as well accept the fact that the property is not worth nearly that sum. Now, what shall we do?

As I have said, various plans have been suggested to protect the Government in this debt. I will state to the House the plan that the committee have reported. The committee have thought that the first question was to try to better our security. We have thought it was not so much a question of when we were paid as it was a question of certainty of payment. I am aware, sir, that the past conduct and management of these railroads has been such as to excite, and perhaps justly excite, great prejudice against them. If we take counsel only of our prejudice I fear we can do nothing. If we take counsel of our judgment, viewing the matter as business men, I hope we may. I think the committee have done the latter, and have taken a business view of the question; they have at least tried to do so. We are not concerned with the past history of these corporations when we come to settle with them. We have looked at it in this way: Here is a great debt due to the Government. What shall we do? Why the first thing we do is to look at the ability of the debtors to pay. What can they pay? When you find what they can pay, then you determine is the Government willing for increased security to extend the time of the final payment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the bill proposes to extend the date of the extinction of the bonds guaranteed by the Government?

Mr. CRISP. I am coming right to that. We have framed a bill, and if it does not meet the approval of the House when the question is considered we are open to receive any other suggestion; we are not wedded to it, but we believe as business men it is a good plan to be adopted.

We provide that this debt of $128,000,000, that will be due us in 1898, shall be divided into one hundred and forty parts, two of which shall be paid each year, beginning now, which is twelve years, you understand, before under the present law we would realize anything. We compute interest upon the one hundred and twenty-eight millions, supposing that to be the sum they are to pay in 1898. We run the average interest forward, as is usual in such business transactions; so that the Government is receiving 3 per cent. interest upon whatever is deferred beyond 1898. Under that plan, instead of waiting twelve years before we receive a dollar and paying out each year from now until then more than a million and a half dollars, we will begin this year receiving from the companies on the debt about the sum of $3,757,496.

A MEMBER. How do you know you will?

Mr. CRISP. I know it in this way: By the terms of the bill it is not operative until the companies have accepted it; and if they do accept it and fail to make the payments, then the whole debt becomes due at once, and the Government can proceed to collect this debt in any way that any creditor could.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The Government must get it subject to the first mortgage.

Mr. CRISP. Of course, having surrendered our first lien to the other bondholders of the company, we can not take it back by act of Congress. But instead of paying over one and a half millions each year we receive more than three and a half millions each year; and in 1898, when under the present law they would owe us $128,000,000, the debt will have been decreased about $41,000,000. There is a partial extension of the time of payment, and there is a partial anticipation of the time of payment; there is an average extension of twenty-four years; but we begin to receive now instead of paying out from now until 1898.

Now, then, let us see what we gain by this plan if the bill should become law and the companies accept it. We have no absolute assurance that they will——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman has not explained whether the bill contains any scheme for refunding or extending the Government debt.

Mr. CRISP. I have endeavored to explain that, instead of the whole debt being due in 1898, forty-one millions of it will be paid before that time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. These bonds must be paid when due. Is there any scheme which embraces their extension or refunding?

Mr. CRISP. The bill has been carefully drawn, so as to preserve all the liens we have now, and whatever rights, franchises, or property these companies now have not embraced in our mortgage we propose to reach by lien. You understand these railroad companies have built great numbers of branch lines and own vast tracts of lands that are not connected with or embraced in the lien of the Government.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask my friend from Georgia if the committee have considered the question if this arrangement is made without the assent of the railroad company, or if it is made with its assent, what the probability is of the railroad company defaulting at once, selling the road, buying it in, and leaving the Government without payment.

Mr. CRISP. You ask what is to prevent that?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I will tell you.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me a further suggestion before he replies, it seems to me that it would only make the default come perhaps next year instead of waiting until the maturity of the bonds.

Mr. CRISP. There is a provision in this bill that the Government, like an individual, may, if necessary, buy to protect itself. As an individual creditor, you would go in and purchase a prior lien to protect your own security. The Government has no right to do that without an act of Congress. As I have said, there is a provision in this bill which permits the Government, if it becomes necessary, to step in and purchase to protect itself. So much for that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the increased security that will be obtained when this act is accepted is set out in the report, and it aggregates about $79,000,000. These companies own non-subsidized lines which are controlled and operated by them, and in most cases they own the majority of the stock of those lines.

Mr. LAIRD. Are not those lines generally of little value?

Mr. CRISP. Those lines are in debt, and we have a report which shows the amount of their indebtedness. We do not, of course, get additional security to the full value of the lines. Their average indebtedness, I believe, is about $8,000 a mile, and that indebtedness will have priority over ours on these non-subsidized lines; but the difference between their value and this indebtedness of $8,000 a mile will be something upon which we shall have a lien.

Mr. PAYSON. Whatever equity the company has in those other lines the Government is to have the benefit of.

Mr. CRISP. The Government is to have the benefit of it.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is another consideration. Under this bill all the transportation accounts of the Government are to be held by the Government. Gentlemen will remember that under the present law, although they owe us all this money, and although we are paying interest for them every year, still we have to pay them one-half our transportation account in cash. Under this bill we shall not have to pay them anything.

Mr. DUNN. Unless transportation account is in excess of the next ensuing payment due from the roads.

Mr. CRISP. Of course, if the amount of our transportation account should be at any time more than the annual or semi-annual payment next due we would pay the difference.

Mr. Speaker, we believe these companies are able to comply with this law, and we believe it is to their interest to comply with it, and I know no better rule of judging whether a man will do a thing than to look to his ability and his interest.

If these companies are to be managed honestly, here is a way in which they may be so managed, here is a way by which the Government may be paid and the companies not injured. We give them also, as my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] suggests, the privilege of refunding their prior debt at 4 per cent. It now bears interest at 6 per cent.; but if when it is due they are unable to pay it they can refund it at 4 per per cent., thus cutting down the rate of interest they have to pay.

These are substantially the provisions of this bill. One word more: If the companies fail to accept this proposition, then the bill provides that the provisions of the Thurman act shall be so amended as to increase the amount to be paid into the sinking fund from 25 per cent. to 40 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Suppose the companies fail to pay the amount due annually?

Mr. CRISP. Then the whole debt becomes due and the Government may proceed to collect in whatever manner it sees fit.

Mr. LAIRD. Why not declare it due now?

Mr. BAYNE. What proportion of the public lands does this bill affect?

Mr. CRISP. There were millions of acres of the public lands granted to these companies, upon which, if this proposition is accepted, we shall get a lien to protect this debt.

Mr. BAYNE. What has been done by these corporations with the proceeds of the sales of those lands?

Mr. CRISP. They have applied them generally, and perhaps exclusively, to the payment of a land mortgage. When they got those lands they gave a mortgage on them. Under the acts granting the lands to the companies, if the lands were not disposed of in three years they were to be open to settlement as other public lands. The companies gave mortgages on them, and thus disposed of them within the meaning of the act. The proceeds of the sales of these lands have been applied to these mortgages, and under their terms must be.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. I understood him to say, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], that in case of the acceptance of this bill by these companies, then, in case they should make default in payment, the Government might come in and buy the property to protect itself.

The SPEAKER. The time fixed for debate on this bill has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make just one other statement.

The SPEAKER. The time has expired. The gentleman can proceed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] be allowed five or ten minutes more, as he may choose.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let me say before consent is granted——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall object, if the time of the gentleman is to be taken up by interruption.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. This is a discussion in which we can not participate under the rules.

Mr. CRISP. The proposition now is simply to set a day under the rules for the consideration of this subject.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. So I understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to extending the gentleman's time as requested.

Mr. HEARD. I wish to inquire whether under the existing law the Government has the right to go in and buy the property in case the company should make default on the maturity of their indebtedness, as the law now fixes the date of its maturity?

Mr. CRISP. There is no provision of the existing law which permits the Government or any officer of the Government to do any such thing.

Mr. HEARD. Then you hold that the rights of the Government are increased by this bill?

Mr. CRISP. If the committee did not believe that the rights of the Government were increased we certainly should not bring in this bill with the expectation of having the House pass it.

Mr. HEARD. I mean increased in that regard.

Mr. CRISP. Under the present status the Government has no right to pay prior bonds, and no right to collect a dollar until 1898, and it has no lien on the branch roads. Under the bill reported by the committee yearly payments of more than three and a half million dollars will begin to be made at once. Default upon the maturity of any installment of the indebtedness of the company gives the Government the right to proceed immediately for the collection of the whole debt, a right which, under the present law, can not be exercised until 1898. A failure on the part of the railroad company to accept the provision of this act results in an act of Congress increasing the amount to be paid into the sinking fund from 25 to 40 per cent. of the net earnings of the roads.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am concerned I see nothing, absolutely nothing, that has been accomplished by the Thurman act except the determination of our right to amend the act of 1864. As to any practical results in dollars and cents, we have received but little substantial benefit from the act. We have, however, obtained the judgment of the highest court in the land that we can amend that act. Now, if the company fails to accept this act, we do make an amendment by requiring 40 per cent. to be paid into the sinking fund. My hope is that the company will accept.

So far as we can see, this is the best that can be done for the interests of the Government at this time. It seems to us that the real interests of the Government absolutely demand that there shall be some legislation toward the collection of this debt. It is utterly absurd to suppose that in 1898 these companies can pay $193,000,000. They can, we think, begin now to pay a little more than three and a half million dollars each year, so that by 1898 they will have paid the Government $41,000,000. And the balance due will be thenceforward paid in semi-annual installments until they have reimbursed us every dollar, principal and interest, that we have paid out in their behalf. This is honest and right, and I think should be acceptable to both parties. We ask that the House now adopt this resolution, so that the question may come up and be fully discussed. If the majority of the House should not approve the plan suggested——

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. I understand he claims it is in the power of Congress to increase the payments under the Thurman act from 25 per cent. to 40 per cent. Will that percentage be reckoned upon the net receipts or the gross receipts?

Mr. CRISP. The net receipts, under the acts of 1862 and 1864.

Mr. SCOTT. If those net receipts should not exceed the amount of interest on the first-mortgage bonds, can the Government deprive the first-mortgage bondholders of the right to be paid their interest out of the earnings of the road?

Mr. CRISP. It can not.

Mr. SCOTT. Then, though the amount to be paid might be increased by Congress from 25 per cent. of the net earnings to 40 per cent., the Government might in fact secure only 10 per cent. or less.

Mr. CRISP. I have already stated within the hearing of the gentleman and the House that so far as I am concerned, after a pretty full investigation of the question, I see no relief to the Government by an increase of the percentage under the Thurman act.

Mr. HERBERT. If this legislation should result in yielding to the Government no more than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] has just suggested, then will not this bill have the effect of putting all remedy out of our hands for twenty-four years longer?

Several MEMBERS. "Oh, no."

Mr. CRISP. I have been very unfortunate in my explanation if I have conveyed any such idea as that.

Mr. HERBERT. I merely wanted to know whether such would be the effect or not.

Mr. CRISP. So far from that being so, I will say to the gentleman that under our plan the payments will begin next year instead of in 1898; and if there should be a default in one payment, the whole debt will be immediately due.

Mr. HERBERT. But the payments depend upon the amount of net income.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, no. The plan proposed by the committee is that the companies shall pay us a little over three and a half million dollars in cash each year, a fixed sum, without regard to their income.

Mr. HERBERT. I did not hear that portion of the gentleman's explanation. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. CRISP. In conclusion I will only say that I hope the House will adopt this resolution and permit us at the time designated to consider this subject. Mr. Speaker, we are so frequently unlocking the doors of the Treasury that a proposition to put something therein should have consideration for its novelty; and, seriously, I know of no measure more important than this, which seeks to put into the Treasury about $128,000,000 that has been paid out for the benefit of these great corporations, and which should now be returned to the Treasury of the people, where it justly belongs.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does the report of the committee set forth fully their scheme?

Mr. CRISP. It does.

Thanking the House for its courtesy, I now ask for a vote.

The question being taken on adopting the resolution, it was adopted (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, some members of the committee desire to print or extend remarks on this subject in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that leave be given.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection members of the committee who desire to do so——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not mean to confine the request to members of the committee.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and so does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the leave requested by the gentleman will be granted.

STUDY OF THE NATURE OF ALCOHOLIC DRINKS, ETC.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Education I move to take from the House Calendar the bill (S. 1405) to provide for the study of the nature of alcoholic drinks and narcotics, and of their effects upon the human system, in connection with the several divisions of the subject of physiology and hygiene, by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and of the District of Columbia, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and Indian and colored schools in the Territories of the United States, and to suspend the rules and pass the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the nature of alcoholic drinks and narcotics, and special instruction as to their effects upon the human system, in connection with the several divisions of the subject of physiology and hygiene, shall be included in the branches of study taught in the common or public schools, and in the Military and Naval Schools, and shall be studied and taught as thoroughly and in the same manner as other like required branches are in said schools, by the use of text-books in the hands of pupils where other branches are thus studied in said schools, and by all pupils in all said schools throughout the Territories, in the Military and Naval Academies of the United States, and in the District of Columbia, and in all Indian and colored schools in the Territories of the United States.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the proper officers in control of any school described in the foregoing section to enforce the provisions of this act; and any such officer, school director, committee, superintendent, or teacher who shall refuse or neglect to comply with the requirements of this act, or shall neglect or fail to make proper provisions for the instruction required and in the manner specified by the first section of this act, for all pupils in each and every school under his jurisdiction, shall be removed from office, and the vacancy filled as in other cases.

SEC. 3. That no certificate shall be granted to any person to teach in the public schools of the District of Columbia or Territories, after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1888, who has not passed a satisfactory examination in physiology and hygiene, with special reference to the nature and the effects of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics upon the human system.

Mr. LORE. I demand a second.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I move by unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). Under the rules of the House, thirty minutes are allowed for debate—fifteen minutes in favor of the motion, and fifteen minutes in opposition to the motion. The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. O'DONNELL, will be recognized to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Delaware, Mr. LORE, will be recognized to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I reserve my time. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Delaware does not take the floor and the gentleman from Michigan does not wish to be heard and no other member seeks the floor, the Chair will submit the question to the House without debate.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, demanded the yeas and nays, but afterward withdrew the demand.

Mr. BENNETT renewed the demand for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 209, nays 8, not voting 105; as follows:

Louttit,	Parker,	Storm,
Lovering,	Peters,	Taylor, I. H.
Lowry,	Pidcock,	Thomas, J. R.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

For the rest of the day:

Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. LIBBEY.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. PETERS.

Mr. ROGERS with Mr. HAYDEN.

Mr. MARTIN with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. ROGERS. I am paired with Mr. HAYDEN, of Massachusetts, otherwise I should have voted for the bill. I do not know how he would have voted, but suppose he would also have voted for it.

Mr. MORRILL. My colleague, Mr. PETERS, who is confined to his room, requested me to state if present he would vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I am reported as paired on all political questions, but not regarding this as a political question, I have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. RICE. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. COLLINS], but he has authorized me to vote on this question, and I have accordingly voted in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I ask by unanimous consent members have general leave to print remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, from the Committee on Labor, moved to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 3d day of June, be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on Labor; this order not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills; and, whether so interfered with on that day or not, shall be a continuing order as above until the bills presented by said committee shall be disposed of.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman to insert the words "or prior orders."

Mr. HOLMAN. And also reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will insert the words "not to conflict with prior orders."

Mr. HOLMAN. And land bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not conflict with those, as they are prior orders.

The resolution as modified was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Insert the words "or bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are prior orders.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think these words should be inserted. They are not prior orders, but get their privilege under the rule.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will modify the resolution so as to include those words.

Mr. BYNUM. Does that include the morning hour?

M. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It does.

Mr. BYNUM. The morning hour ought not to be included.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand a second.

The resolution as modified was again read.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is the effect of that order, if it be adopted by the House, to give preference to any other business reported from the Committee on Labor after the one day has been consumed?

The SPEAKER. It will be a continuing order and an order which will remain in force until all bills reported from the committee are disposed of; but only one day is fixed for consideration.

Mr. CANNON. But it is a continuing order from day to day, as I understand it, until all their bills are disposed of?

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of it.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the resolution be again reported.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to inquire of the Speaker if that means to set apart that particular day——

The SPEAKER. The order will be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Misssouri whether he will not modify that resolution so that it shall read "any bills relating to the arbitration of labor, growing out of the President's communication to this House."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We already have that right under the order of the House.

Mr. DUNN. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. That resolution uses the words "be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented" by this committee, subject, however, to certain prior orders. Now I desire to know whether or not, if we "set apart" this day, we can defeat any measure that may be brought up by raising the question of consideration against it; or whether these words will not bind us notwithstanding the exceptions.

The SPEAKER. It is always in the power of the House to determine, if the question of consideration is raised against any particular bill or proposition, whether it will enter upon its consideration then or not.

Mr. REAGAN. But can the question of consideration be raised? We had an example of that two or three days ago, in which it was not so held.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled just the contrary, as the gentleman will find upon an examination. The Chair ruled that the gentleman could raise the question of consideration against each bill called up by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] if the bill was in the House. If the bill was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, then the House could refuse to consider it by refusing to go into the committee.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That was the ruling.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand a second.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to ask another question——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered, and I will make a brief statement to the House, which I think will be satisfactory.

Mr. DIBBLE. I object to a second being considered as ordered, unless this resolution is modified so as to save the second hour for the consideration of committee bills.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am entirely willing to have that second hour saved, and have no objection to such a modification.

Mr. DIBBLE. Then I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires, before the debate begins, to understand exactly what form the resolution will assume under the several modifications which have been accepted. The Clerk will again report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 3d day of June, 1886, after the hour for the consideration of bills, be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on Labor; this order not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills, bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, or prior orders, and whether so interfered with on that day or not, shall be a continuing order as above until the bills presented by said committee shall be disposed of.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to know if the gentleman from Missouri has power under the rules to accept modifications or amendments to the resolution, which, as I understand, he is authorized by his committee to introduce?

The SPEAKER. That is not for the Chair to determine. If the gentleman's committee has authorized him to do so the Chair can have no control over the matter either way.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Under the language of the resolution, as I recollect it, the gentleman if he does not get through on the first day shall have a continuing order, to take effect from day to day, until he disposes of all the bills reported by the committee.

Mr. REAGAN. That is just what it does.

Mr. HAMMOND. I would like to know from the Chair how long that order will last?

The SPEAKER. It will last until Congress adjourns, on the 4th of March next. [Laughter.]

But the Chair will say, in response to the gentleman, that no day is dedicated to the consideration of this business under the resolution as reported, according to the construction of the Chair heretofore upon such orders, except the first day named. After that the gentleman from Missouri can call up bills, but it will be for the House to determine whether they shall be considered or not. The continuing order, however, lasts until Congress expires.

Mr. MILLS. Let me ask the gentleman if he intends to call up the educational bill under this order?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not.

Mr. DUNN. Then I will vote against the order.

Mr. MORRISON. Let us have a vote by tellers on seconding the demand.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri to make this further modification in his resolution: to strike out the words "such business" and insert in lieu thereof "for the consideration of such legislation relating to labor in the United States."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. In the first place, I am not authorized to accept this modification.

Mr. RANDALL. You have been modifying the resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And in the second place, I do think it remarkable when the committee have tried to get a day from the Committee on Rules and they pocketed the resolution, and when now we get it before the House, there should be shown such intense hostility to giving the committee a day for the consideration of its business. But you may vote it down if you please.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say there never has been a vote in the Committee on Rules cast by a single member of the committee that was not in favor of labor.

The SPEAKER. The tellers, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MORRISON, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. O'NEILL, will take their places.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. I am satisfied the intention is not understood.

Several members called for the regular order.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 83.

So there was a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the resolution and fifteen in opposition. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. O'NEILL, will control the time in support of the resolution, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MORRISON, the time in opposition to it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. In order to remove a wrong impression in the minds of some of the members concerning the effects of this resolution if adopted, and the scope of measures likely to be brought before the House, I desire to state that the only bills now pending on the Calendar and in the committee which could be called up under this resolution other than the educational bill are the bills to prohibit the employment of aliens on public works and to prohibit the use of the product of convict labor on public buildings; to protect laborers, servants, and mechanics in their wages; to restore wages in the public printing establishment to the standard of 1879; to extend the scope of the eight-hour law, not in regard to the back claims pending under it which were referred to a different committee, but to extend its scope; to grant leave of absence to certain laborers in different Departments of the Government; to provide for the incorporation by a national law of trade unions; to further extend the scope of the bill passed by the last Congress prohibiting importation of contract labor, to include those engaged in the traffic in foreign slaves under the guise of "employment agents." Those bills, together with the President's message on the subject of arbitration, comprise the business of that committee.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Before I yield I want to make one further statement. This House in its wisdom referred to the Committee on Labor the educational bill, and in the face of the fact that we can not obtain a two-thirds vote on that bill to-day—I do not believe we could and the members of the committee do not think they could—believing they could not obtain a two-thirds vote for the consideration of that bill, the committee did not think it right to ask to have all its other business killed unless that bill was included. I desire to state on behalf of the committee that that bill will not be called up under this order.

Mr. GOFF. Is that statement founded on action taken by the committee?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. On action taken by the committee when six members were present. It was the unanimous action of those then present, and it was ratified by two other members; making it the action of the majority.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the provisions he has enumerated are in one bill or in separate bills.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. In separate bills.

Mr. RANDALL. If the statement of the gentleman be correct and the educational bill will not be brought up, I ask why will he not accept these words: "Such business as relates to labor in the United States?" That will cover every one of the measures he has enumerated.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have no objection to that; none whatever.

Mr. COWLES. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COWLES. I want to know if that amendment to the resolution is open to objection at this stage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state the modification proposed and ask unanimous consent.

Mr. COWLES. I object. I am for a fair deal on this educational bill. I am not afraid to put myself upon record upon it, and I do not think others should be.

Mr. RANDALL. The suggestion I offered had no purpose to hide my vote on that bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will vote to take up that bill, but I am not willing to jeopardize the entire work of the Committee on Labor by including it in the resolution and failing to secure a day for the consideration of those bills.

I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], who has charge of the educational bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope it will not be necessary for me to assert to this House that I am a friend of the educational bill. But I am also a friend to fair play. This Committee on Labor comes in upon the day for the suspension of the rules when they require to get a two-thirds vote; and it is evident that although we have voted with the gentleman from Missouri, there may be some difficulty in securing for his committee, for the consideration of measures that have been legitimately and properly referred to it, the time which is necessary. As one friend of the educational bill, with no authority to bind any human being on this floor and with no expectation of my announcement securing any one to follow me, I say as a matter of fair play and justice to the Committee on Labor, and recognizing the great merit of many of these bills which they have presented, I shall gladly and cheerfully vote for this resolution, or trust to the justice and generosity of that committee in due time under the rules to give us a consideration of that other great bill, which, in my judgment, is as important as any of these.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] think that the educational bill has had fair play in this House?

Mr. WILLIS. I am not on the stool of confession. I have not expressed any opinion on that point, nor is it necessary.

Mr. DUNN. I have never seen any great measure throttled by such extraordinary and unwarranted methods as have been resorted to here to stifle this educational bill.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Nor I.

Mr. MCADOO. It is an extraordinary measure, and has to be met in that way.

Mr. DUNN. It is gagging the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman certainly can not apply that remark to our committee.

Mr. DUNN. I apply it to those who govern this House so as to prevent the consideration of that bill.

Mr. MORRISON. Whatever responsibility attaches to me I accept. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DUNN. My opinion is that it is very large.

Mr. MORRISON. Very well. I have no inclination to avoid it, however large it may be.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Then let every member of the House have an opportunity to take the responsibility of voting for or against the bill.

Mr. MCADOO. We are perfectly willing.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Very well; then let us have it included in this resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I can state frankly, on behalf of the Committee on Labor, that that bill will not be called up under this order. I am authorized to make that statement by a majority of the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. With that understanding I will vote for the order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say it is unfair and ungenerous in gentlemen who pretend to be friends of the educational bill, when they have had that bill referred to a committee to which it does not belong simply for the purpose of getting it reported, and when they have got a report, to then put their legs around the neck of that committee and undertake to throttle all the rest of its business unless it will agree to carry that bill also.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I objected from the beginning to making labor carry the educational bill. If, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] states, the resolution is now in such form that we shall be confined, on the day designated, to the consideration of matters which relate to the laboring interests of the country, then I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. No other bills will be called up under this order than those I have mentioned.

Mr. SPRINGER. With that understanding I will vote for the order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] whether he expects at another time to call up the education bill.

Mr. CABELL. If the majority of the members of the House want to vote upon that bill they ought to have a right to take it up.

A MEMBER. There is no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. But we object to labor being made the means of giving an undue advantage to this educational bill.

Mr. COWLES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is not occupying the floor.

Mr. COWLES. He has just sat down. I want to ask him what undue advantage this gives to the education bill?

Mr. RANDALL. Labor affects everybody here.

Mr. COWLES. So does education.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, some of us are not prepared to vote for education as embodied in the Blair bill.

Mr. COWLES. I am.

Mr. CABELL. If the majority of this House want to vote that way, they ought to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. COWLES. We come here as a party pledged to support that bill, and I am in favor of carrying out every pledge.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. How much time am I to be allowed for these interruptions?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not subject to interruption except with his own consent.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question before he sits down. I understood him to say awhile ago that he would give the educational bill a day.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I say I am willing to do all in my power to give it a day.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. But the committee do not ask that it shall have a day.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. They have reported the bill to the House and it is on the Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I know it is on the Calendar, and so are a great many other bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] controls the time in opposition to this resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, it used to be customary in this House in former times for committees and individuals to ask for a suspension of the rules in order that they might have the privilege of calling up for consideration certain special and important bills. The practice has been no doubt useful in the past, but in this session we have shrewder men in Congress than we used to have; so that the Committee on Agriculture has got the whole of its business set as a special order; the Committee on Foreign Affairs has asked to have the whole of its business set as a special order, and now the Committee on Labor asks to have the whole of its business set as a special order. Had we not better make the thing general and set all the business of the House down as a special order? [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; I have not time. I do not want any questions on that subject.

Mr. Speaker, the practice which has grown up in this House of thus assigning the whole business of committees as special orders to the exclusion of great public measures is one which ought not to be tolerated. We ought now to arrest the evil. The petty business of this House it may be well enough for us to act on, if there be leisure for it. But the Committee on Commerce now has before this House a measure that has interested this whole country for fourteen years, a measure on which the people demand action, a measure affecting the cost of transportation from one end of the country to the other to the extent of millions of dollars; and this important bill is to be set aside for petty measures, or to be antagonized by a combination of them. The Committee on the Public Lands seeks to bring to the attention of the House measures which ought to be acted on, involving the restoration to the public domain of millions of acres of land. The Committee on Pacific Railroads desires the action of the House upon a single measure, which, as has been explained to-day, involves more than one hundred million dollars of indebtedness due the Government. Yet with these important questions pending, upon which the American people are anxiously demanding action, we go on day after day setting apart the time of this House for the consideration of the whole business of committees——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Has not your committee already had two days?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You had one day.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, we had one day.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And you have a continuing order for the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

But, Mr. Speaker, these committees have grown especially sharp in another respect. They not only ask that the whole business of committees be assigned as special orders, but each of these committees asks that the time of the House be "set apart" for the consideration of its business.

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman's committee had its day, in which fifty-four bills were passed.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know, sir, what is to become of the business of this House if each committee is to have days "set apart" for its business, and no preference is to be given by the House to great commanding measures, which require consideration by Congress in response to the demand of the American people. Because of the impropriety of this practice of "setting apart" the time of the House for the whole business of a committee, and because of the impropriety of allowing petty business of all sorts to come in the way of great measures the consideration of which the country demands, I protest against the adoption of this resolution.

As to the measures which have been named to the House by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], who seems to feel that the whole labor interests of this country together with the necessity of guarding against the incursions of foreigners rest upon his shoulders, some of those measures, from his statement, seem to me to carry such absurdity on their face that they ought not to be considered at any rate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman from Texas, I believe, has opposed all of them so far; he has consistently fought us all the way through.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman assumes a very general proposition that he is not warranted in assuming. While I do not profess to be a demagogue, while I make no bid for votes, I am the friend of labor and have been ever since I was able to form an intelligent judgment. Those who know me, those especially whom I represent on this floor, are well aware of this fact; but I never sacrifice my manhood or my character as a Representative by appealing to vulgar passions against the best interests of the country and endeavoring to array one class of our population against another. [Applause.] I do not believe in doing that. All classes of the American people are one family, and we should be interested alike in the welfare of all of them. The man who would engender strife between class and class is not a friend of his country. The man who would give special precedence to any one class of the citizens of this country as against other classes, whether it be because the favored class is numerous or because it is bound together by powerful organization, does not perform a patriotic duty.

Whenever a matter comes here upon which Congress can act, upon which it is right Congress should act for the protection of labor, for the protection of the rights of the humble, I shall be found in line struggling for those rights, as I have done during the whole course of my life. But when I am asked to turn summersaults whenever labor is mentioned [laughter], when I am asked to do things that violate the Constitution or violate our sense of common right and common propriety, I do not intend to do it. The gentleman from Missouri is very anxious as to the responsibility to be assumed by other men here. Let him bear his own responsibility; I will take care of mine; and I am willing to meet that responsibility before my constituents.

The SPEAKER To whom does the gentleman from Illinois now yield?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES]. I want to hear something about education. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, after the attitude of the Democratic party on the subject of education in the last campaign, that the duty and responsibility which my illustrious friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has devolved upon my shoulders could not have been conferred upon those worthier and stronger than mine to bear it. I am more sorry to find myself among so few here who are willing to champion openly the cause of public education.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Where was the Democratic party committed on this subject?

Mr. COWLES. In its national platform, and, if I mistake not, in almost every State platform.

A MEMBER. Not in the national platform.

Mr. COWLES. I do not refer particularly to the Blair bill, but to the general principle of public education.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend his remarks. The Chair again appeals to gentlemen to take their seats. The House will come to order.

Mr. COWLES. The gentleman from New York asks where we were committed to it. We were committed to it in the platform of the last national Democratic convention. We were committed then and there to favor education. We were committed to it in the Democratic platform of my own State. We were committed to it by my party in my State and in most of the other States.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I deny that the Democratic party was ever committed in its platform to any such thing.

Mr. COWLES. Gentlemen come here now, and I am afraid they are so short in their memory that some of them have forgotten the pledges they made to the people during the campaign. I am willing to stand on the same platform, and where I stood in the campaign. I espoused the cause of free and popular education before the people then, and I espouse it now and here.

If the proposition designated as the Blair bill is not the correct thing, why then let gentlemen who say they are in favor of aiding education, if offered in the proper way, formulate some other proposition that is better. I am willing to vote on their proposition, and if I shall be satisfied it is better I will vote with them.

But what I want, Mr. Speaker, is to keep our pledges made to the people and utilize the surplus in the Treasury, which has been so much talked of, in the best manner possible, so as to do the greatest good to the greatest number. Can we do that better than by favoring popular education? The people of the section from which I come, and whom I have the honor to represent here, are taxed to the utmost extent of their capacity. They are taxed by the tariff and they are taxed by the internal revenue; they pay their taxes as honestly as any other people in America, and yet they do not get back a particle of it—no, sir, not a particle. It is all dispensed in other quarters and for purposes in which they have, save the necessary expenses of the machinery of Government, no immediate interest.

We ask for this as a measure of justice. We demand it of the country as a matter of right. Gentlemen will come here and vote money by hundreds of millions of dollars for other projects. It is not dispensed in the country from which I come, nor for the immediate good of the people there, and what I ask of you is to deal fairly with us and set off our portion of the surplus public money to be devoted to the best purpose to which it can be devoted, and that is for the elevation and Christianization of the people by the means of popular education. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. MORRISON. How many minutes have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes. How much does he yield?

Mr. MORRISON. I will give the gentleman from Arkansas two and one-half minutes of my time, or I will give him all of it if he will not say anything against me. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this resolution, not because I wish to indicate that I would be opposed to any of the measures which the chairman of the Committee on Labor has declared he will call up. I do not know how I might vote on those measures when I come to consider each one of them. I may favor some and may vote against some.

But, sir, I vote against it because it is an unfair discrimination against what I consider the most important and urgent measure before Congress, the educational bill. The opponents of it are afraid to allow this House to vote on the educational bill. That bill has never been allowed to get before this House for consideration, and the most remarkable and extraordinary precautions seem to have been taken to prevent it. Fortifications have been erected against it. All the avenues of approach have been studiously barricaded against it. The House is for it and the whole country wants it. But, sir, it is all well understood. The country gains no information from the declaration of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that he assumes his share of the responsibility. He is always frank, straightforward, and manly, and that is simply a frank confession on his part, and a few others might also come to the confessional. To show how unfair this world is, for instance, here is another measure, one of ill-fame, that can get here with or without aid or approval of committees. The right of way is always open to it. There dropped out of my bundle of reports the other evening this one, numbered 2288, on bill 740, to extend the bonded period for whisky. "It is the same old sixpence," and seems to let in the same old scheme which has been kicked with ignominy out of this House regularly during the last two or three Congresses.

But, like a "bad dollar," it continues to come back, unbidden and unwelcome. It is sad to know that there are some gentlemen here who seem to be willing to vote millions for whisky, but not one dollar for education. [Laughter and applause.] Yes, sir, not one dollar for education. That is not my platform. This odious whisky bill received two years ago what should have been its eternal quietus. It was then proposed to extend the bonded period, involving about $75,000,000 per annum to the whisky dealers, two years, making a chasm of $150,000,000 in the revenues. And the gentleman from New York, speaking for the bill, said the charge which I made that they intended at the end of two years to surrender the revenue was possibly true, and he would favor it. That bill comes, as before, from the Committee on Ways and Means. I enter my protest against such a policy.

Mr. DUNHAM. Where does it come from?

Mr. DUNN. The Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MORRISON. Have I any time left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has half a minute left.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Arkansas does not understand that report, but wholly misunderstands and misinterprets it. There is no report from the Committee on Ways and Means giving away or remitting a single dollar of the tax on whisky. No, not one cent is to be remitted or given away.

Mr. DUNN. But it extends the bonded period.

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, as recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is charged with the collection of the tax, and it is in the interest of the retention and collection of the tax. While I have a place here this tax will never be taken off with my consent or vote. Until voted off by you or others it will remain.

As for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES], who says that the Blair educational bill is embodied or to be found in the Democratic platform adopted at Chicago, I wish only to say that he forgets what party did that; it was the Republican, not the Democratic party. [Laughter.] The Chicago Democratic platform says:

We are opposed to all propositions which upon any pretext would convert the General Government into a machine for collecting taxes to be distributed among the States or the citizens thereof.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I yield three minutes then to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY].

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, it so happens that I am a member of the committee of which my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is chairman, the Committee on Commerce. I am likewise a member of the committee of which my friend from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] is chairman, the Committee on Labor, which reports this resolution.

I remember that it has been but a short time since when the Committee on Commerce had a full day set apart for the consideration of its measures.

Mr. REAGAN. Only for one class, a single class of business reported from the committee.

Mr. TARSNEY. We passed upon that day fifty-four bills reported from the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Labor now asks this poor boon of this House to-day, that it may set apart a few hours' time to consider some questions which go to the very root of the discord which prevails throughout the land at this time.

Will the House shut the door to this committee; will it shut the door to the labor of this country that is suffering to-day, and say that it will not devote any time to the consideration of the evils that are producing this trouble? We ask this House to set apart one day that we may consider bills, and my humble judgment is, Mr. Speaker, that it will require but one day to consider all the bills which the committee will call up for the action of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. We have already appointed a committee to investigate the subject of the troubles to which the gentleman has referred, and they can come in and make their report and ask action of the House upon it.

Mr. TARSNEY. And I answer the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Speaker, by saying that the Speaker of this House appointed a committee at the very beginning of the session to investigate these troubles. That committee stands here upon the floor to-day with a number of important bills upon the Calendar of the House which reach the very evils which this special committee went West to investigate, and now we ask that we have a day set apart to consider them.

So far as the educational bill is concerned, it does not pertain to labor. It has no business in the Labor Committee, and as a member of that committee I am frank to say here and now that while in committee the bill was fairly dealt with, yet, sir, I am prepared to admit here to this House and to the country that when it comes before the House for consideration it will find an opponent in your humble servant. [Applause.]

Why, sir, I come from a State that boasts of the best educational system in this whole broad land. It has a system, beginning with our common schools, controlled and directed by the people living within sight of the school-houses where their children are educated; in our cities and villages are our public high schools, where our children are taught, are educated beyond the rudiments, and towering above them all is the great University of Ann Arbor——

Mr. WILLIS. And that system of education, the gentleman should not forget, came from grants of the public lands by the United States.

Mr. TARSNEY. I decline to yield to the gentleman.

I say towering above them all is the great university at Ann Arbor, where we invite your people from Kentucky, the people from everywhere in this broad land to come and receive at our expense an education for their children. Do you ask me about the lands granted to the State of Michigan for educational purposes? Why, God bless you, my Kentucky friend, every acre of Government land in the State of Michigan that has ever been utilized for educational purposes would not pay the expense of its school system for six months in any one school year. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I want only to say in so far as the question of education is concerned that it was considered fully by the Committee on Labor, and I differ as widely from my friend from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] in this respect as any two men can differ on any subject. The gentleman speaks of these questions as being essentially different. I can see blending together the two questions of education and labor. Where you improve the condition of the laboring classes, that benefit is felt all the way through every walk of society, from the lowest to the highest. But this is not the place to discuss that question. When the educational bill comes up we may consider it fairly upon its merits; but for the present the only question for our determination is whether this House will give to the cause of labor a day or not; and I want you gentlemen to keep your pledges made to the people and recollect that it is but a few months now before you will go back to them again. You can not stand before any intelligent constituency and give a reasonable excuse why you would not give to the cause of labor, to the reports from the Committee on Labor, a day in this House. That is all we ask.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I understand, if I may be permitted to make an inquiry, that that order if adopted gives all the reports of this Committee on Labor a sort of standing order for consideration during the remainder of this Congress?

Mr. O'NEILL. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the resolution.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. I want to know whether this report has not already been read nine or ten times.

The SPEAKER. It has been read several times; but without objection it will be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BLAND. I wish now to make a parliamentary inquiry: whether or not that order will cover simply such bills as are brought up on that day from the committee for consideration, or whether it will permit the committee to call up any bill that may hereafter be reported?

The SPEAKER. The language of the resolution is very plain: "Such bills as may be presented by the committee."

Mr. BLAND. Then of course they can call up any bill they may report at any time throughout this Congress?

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] yields me a quarter of a minute. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] asked me as to the organization of the Committee on Education. I desire to say the Speaker of the House organized that committee, as he did every committee in this House, with reference to the public interest, and solely with reference to that.

Mr. DUNN. I do not think I asked the gentleman any such question.

Mr. WILLIS. And I believed at the time the committee was organized the Speaker did not know the opinions of a single member of it except myself on this question.

Mr. DUNN. I have no idea that I intimated any such thing.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I misunderstood the gentleman and withdraw what I have said.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 18, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 9, 1886, documents containing a list of claims allowed by the accounting officer of the Treasury Department for the payment of which no appropriations have been made by Congress; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication will lie on the table and be printed. The accompanying documents, having been already printed by order of the present Congress, will not be reprinted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 8, 1886, certain information in regard to the construction and expediency of completing the harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, near Cape Ann; which was read.

Mr. DAWES. Let it be printed, without the accompanying maps, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The accompanying papers, except the maps, will be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will extend to the accompanying papers, without the maps. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, replying to a resolution of the 10th instant, calling for a report in regard to the applications of postmasters and late postmasters for readjustment of salaries under the act of March, 1882. As this letter is long the Chair will not have it read, as is generally done, unless the reading is specially called for. The communication, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE. I present a memorial of officers of American mail steamship lines, setting forth the advantages of governmental aid and denying that any attempts are being made to improperly influence Congress to that end.

I very willingly present this memorial, not only because it is a very brief and complete statement of the advantages to be gained to our commerce from governmental aid to mail steamship lines, but also because it denies very squarely what has been stated in certain newspapers, that an attempt is being made to improperly influence Congress in the interest of what are called subsidies to such lines.

I wish to say here and now that if this effort in the interest of reviving American commerce ever prevails in Congress, it will not be done by the influence of the "lobby." That can only do harm. Success can only come to this effort because the American people are growing more and more interested in the subject, and sooner or later Congress must respond to the popular demand. I hope to hear of no lobbying influence anywhere in its favor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CULLOM. I present the petition of Isaac N. Osborn, late a private in Company C, Twenty-first Indiana Volunteers, praying to be placed upon the pension-roll, and setting out the reasons for his request in the petition. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Fernandina, Fla.; a petition of citizens of Waldo, Fla.; a petition of citizens of Ocala, Fla.; and a petition of citizens of Callahan, Fla., praying that the time of the Florida Railway and Navigation Company for the completion of their road may be extended; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present petitions of citizens of Carson, Fairfield, and Brookville, in the State of Iowa, praying for the passage of the bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] placing the manufacture and sale of all imitations of butter under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and taxing them 10 cents a pound. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of Henry Talley and others, citizens and tax-payers of McLean County, Dakota, praying for the passage of the bill taxing lands sold by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, by Henry W. Warren, president, and E. A. Manning, secretary. This is a conference composed of two hundred and fifty ministers and representing thirty-five thousand church members. They beg leave to present to the Senate and House of Representatives their respectful petition, showing:

1. That the treaty of 1881 between the United States and China, in which China gave her consent to the restriction of immigration of Chinese laborers to this country, provided that "Chinese laborers who are now in the United States shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and the subjects of the most favored nation." Said treaty also contained the following solemn pledge on the part of our Government: "If Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, now either temporarily or permanently residing in the territory of the United States, meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons the Government of the United States will exert all its power to devise measures for their protection and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty."

2. That most flagrant and grievous outrages have been perpetrated upon the Chinese in Wyoming and Washington Territories and in the States of Oregon and California, and in many places in that portion of our country the purpose is still openly expressed of driving out the Chinese inhabitants.

3. That in the course of these outrages not only has much property belonging to Chinese residents been destroyed, but many persons have been put to death.

4. That the failure to keep our treaty obligations and the inhuman and brutal massacres which have been perpetrated upon these strangers in our midst have disgraced our country in the eyes of the civilized world and subjected us to the just judgments of a righteous God.

5. That the safety of our citizens in China is imperiled by these frequent and unredressed wrongs to Chinese subjects in the United States, and that we have no right to expect that the people of a heathen country will be more careful of the rights of American merchants and missionaries than the people of this Christian country are of the rights of the Chinese in our land.

6. That it is imperatively necessary that immediate measures of the most stringent character be taken for the protection of the lives and property of the Chinese in this country, and the spirit of persecution and lawlessness so rife in some regions be sternly rebuked and prompt and efficient punishment be visited upon lawbreakers.

We therefore petition your honorable body to enact, without delay, such measures as will enable the officers of the law to suppress all efforts to persecute and drive out the Chinese, and secure to them, wherever they may be in our wide domain, the same protection afforded to all other persons in "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH presented a petition of the Grocers' Association of the District of Columbia, on behalf of the American Agricultural and Dairy Association, praying for the passage of House bill No. 8328, defining butter and imposing a tax and regulating the manufacture and sale and importation and exportation of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

TAX ON IMITATION BUTTER.

Mr. BECK. I present a petition, which, as it is brief, I shall read. I understand that similar petitions have gone to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry heretofore. I desire to send this petition to the Committee on Finance, if I am correct. It is very brief, and I read the heading over the names:

The undersigned, dairymen and butter-makers, respectfully petition your honorable body for the adoption of the bill of the American Agricultural and Dairy Association, introduced by Hon. WARNER MILLER, of New York, in the Senate, and Hon. WILLIAM L. SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, in the House of Representatives, placing the manufacture and sale of all imitation butter under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and taxing it 10 cents per pound. And your petitioners represent that the prompt adoption of such an effective measure is absolutely necessary to save the dairy industry of the United States from ruin and to protect the consumers of butter from fraud and imposition of the most extreme character.

The petition is signed by J. F. Roberts, of Waterford, Pa., and quite a number of others.

I desire the reference of the petition, which I find is met by remonstrances from the Cincinnati, Louisville, Chicago, and other live-stock exchanges, to the Committee on Finance, as I think that is the only committee which can deal with these questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the petition presented by him be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER. I hope that the Senator will not insist upon or request that reference. This whole matter up to the present time has gone to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, not only in the Senate, but in the House of Representatives. Certainly if any subject should properly go to that committee, which is charged with the interests of agriculture, this question should go there.

It does not follow that any inference can be made as to what the action of that committee will be. It may be in favor of a tax and it may be in favor of some other measure of relief. But if the question to which the petition refers can not go to the Committee on Agriculture, then the Committee on Agriculture had better be dispensed with entirely in this body. From time to time for many years other committees have been trenching upon the duties and privileges of that committee, until a few years ago it had been substantially driven entirely out of the Capitol and into quarters which are not large enough to hold the committee itself, much less to be able within its committee-room to give hearings to any persons who shall come before it as petitioners. Some days ago when this question was being considered in the Committee on Agriculture it was compelled to ask the privilege of the Committee on Patents that it might hold its sessions in that room, because the Committee on Agriculture was not provided with accommodations sufficient for the business properly coming before it.

As this petition refers to the whole subject, and there has been no decision either by the House of Representatives or by this body as to whether there shall be an attempt to pass purely a tax-bill, or whether there shall be some other regulation, or whether nothing shall be done, I insist that all these petitions shall go to that committee, where they have already gone and where they properly belong.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York if his committee has considered the question whether there is any power at all to originate any such measure as a tax-bill in this body.

Mr. MILLER. The Committee on Agriculture is considering the subject at the present time. As to the question which the Senator submits, I will say that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will undertake not to invade the rights of the House of Representatives or to violate the Constitution by any action which it may see fit to take. If the committee should decide in favor of a tax measure, of course it would have to wait until the other House should have acted upon the subject.

But I do not propose to have this subject taken away from the Committee on Agriculture unless the majority of the Senate favor that course, and if they do, we may just as well know it now as at any other time.

Mr. DAWES. I am desirous of co-operating with the Committee on Agriculture in any feasible legislation on this subject; but I have been troubled very much with the question whether any tax measure could be originated here. If any other remedial legislation could be adopted here that does not include a tax, I should think that with more propriety should go to the Committee on Agriculture than to the Committee on Finance. Going to the Committee on Finance includes the idea that this imitation product can be taxed, and if it can be taxed certainly neither committee could have original jurisdiction. Therefore, if the Committee on Agriculture can devise some method of protecting the community against fraudulent transactions in imitations of butter, that would be their proper work.

Mr. MILLER. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts I can say, without unduly indicating what the Committee on Agriculture propose to do in this matter, that if the House of Representatives, which has the constitutional power to originate tax bills, a power which undoubtedly does not pertain to this body, shall fail to act in that direction within due time, I have no doubt the Committee on Agriculture will undertake to formulate a bill to in some degree meet this great evil in a way which will be within constitutional limits. Then the subject must undoubtedly belong to the Committee on Agriculture, as I hold that the whole subject now belongs there.

As the question of taxation is a question which can not now be before the Senate or before its committees properly, I think there can be no possible reason given why these petitions which are now coming in should be taken from the channel in which they have all gone up to the present time.

Mr. BECK. The petition I had the honor of presenting a few minutes ago deals with taxation and taxation alone, and it asks for nothing else. I read it for the purpose of showing that.

Mr. MILLER. I beg the Senator's pardon; if he will read the petition he will find that it undertakes to do a good deal more than merely to impose taxation.

Mr. BECK. Let the petition be read again from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the petition, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned, dairymen and butter-makers, respectfully petition your honorable body for the adoption of the bill of the American Agricultural and Dairying Association, introduced by Hon. WARNER MILLER, of New York, in the Senate, and by Hon. WILLIAM L. SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, in the House of Representatives, placing the manufacture and sale of all imitations of butter under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the United States and taxing it 10 cents per pound; and your petitioners represent that the prompt adoption of such an effective measure is absolutely necessary to save the dairy industry of the United States from ruin and to protect the consumers of butter from fraud and imposition of the most extreme character.

Mr. BECK. As I understand it, that petition is looking alone to the question of taxation. The bills may contain other provisions; I have not the bills before me.

Mr. MILLER. The petition refers to the bill introduced by me, and the bill itself contains many other provisions tending in the direction of preventing fraud in the manufacture of imitation goods.

Mr. BECK. The remonstrances against it, one of which I have in my hand from the Chicago Live-Stock Exchange, which they say was unanimously adopted and ordered to be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress, proceeds upon the same idea that it is a tax measure that is being urged. The remonstrance to which I refer reads as follows:

CHICAGO LIVE-STOCK EXCHANGE, UNION STOCK-YARDS,
Chicago, May 10, 1886.

At a full meeting of this association, held at their rooms this day, the following resolutions were reported from the undersigned committee, and were adopted by a unanimous vote:

Whereas bills are now pending in both Houses of Congress proposing special taxes on all manufacturers and venders of oleomargarine and butterine, and also proposing an internal-revenue tax of 10 cents on each pound of those articles made in this country, and placing the production and sale of them under charge of the Internal Revenue Bureau; and

Whereas the proposed laws, while purporting to be revenue bills, are in reality intended to stop the manufacture of oleomargarine and butterine in this country: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Chicago Live-Stock Exchange, That we are firmly opposed to the passage of any law prohibiting or taxing the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine or butterine, for the following reasons:

1. The leading chemists of this country have repeatedly examined and pronounced oleomargarine and butterine healthful articles of food. This being the case, Congress has no right to prohibit their manufacture or sale; and to subject them to taxation, when revenue is not needed, is equally a violation of constitutional rights.

2. In this market prime fat cattle are worth at least $2 per head more than they would bring if the manufacture of these desirable articles of food was prohibited or burdened with unjust taxation, and the materials now used in their manufacture were thus compelled to be used in other channels.

3. The price of choice grades of butter is frequently so high as to place them beyond the reach of people of moderate means, who can now get a wholesome and palatable substitute at a low price, but who would, if the proposed laws should be enacted, be compelled to eat poor butter or do without.

Resolved, That the secretary of this exchange be instructed to forward copies of these resolutions to our Senators and Members in Congress, and to furnish a copy to the press.

IRUS COY,
L. B. DOUD,
J. C. BOHART,
SAMUEL WAUGH,
B. F. HARRISON,
Committee.
C. W. BAKER, Secretary.

The remonstrance assumes, as the petition does, that taxation is the remedy proposed, and I suppose the Committee on Finance, having to await the action of the other House, is the committee to deal with that subject. If a bill should come from the House of Representatives making no proposition to tax this product the Committee on Finance would not take any charge of it. Until the other House does act this body can not deal with taxation, and when it does deal with the subject of taxation the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Finance alone under our organization is the proper body to consider the question.

I have no desire to express any opinion particularly upon the subject of these petitions and remonstrances. Taxation, it seems to me, is not the remedy. If oleomargarine is injurious to health, its manufacture ought to be stopped entirely by State authority. If it is a wholesome article. then people have an equal right to use it and to make it as they have to make and use butter, if they want it. But it ought to be so stamped and marked that every man who buys it can know what it is, and know that he is buying oleomargarine or butterine.

If we can do anything in that direction it ought to be done; but beyond that, to say that a man shall not eat what he wants if it is wholesome and good, and that a man shall not manufacture that without a tax being imposed upon it, it seems to me is not legislation that we ought to indulge in.

That is the view I take at present. I have no doubt I have eaten this article. I hope I never have; I never will, if I know it; and therefore I want it stamped and branded so that people can know it. If people prefer it and can buy it more cheaply than they can buy butter, let them have it, if it is fit to be eaten at all; and if it is not, then a tax ought not to be imposed; it ought to be stopped entirely as injurious to public health.

I thought the Committee on Finance was the proper committee to deal with the subject, but if the Senator from New York has any feeling about it, and there are other matters in the bill (I confess I have not studied it with care), I am willing for the time being to let the petition go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, advising the Senator from New York, however, that if the other House sends over any bill on the subject involving taxation I shall then make the motion to send that bill to the Committee on Finance, which can and ought to deal with taxation.

In the mean time this petition may go with the others. I did not know where they had all gone until this morning. It may go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, so that they can look into it in the mean time, reserving the right, when the House bill comes over, if it deals with taxation, to move that it shall go to the Committee on Finance. I shall therefore let the petition go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MORRILL. I am glad the Senator from Kentucky has consented to that reference. If a bill shall be reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry imposing any taxation, it will be time enough then to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK. I am willing that the petition may go there for the present.

Mr. MILLER. The bill of which the Senator from Kentucky has spoken contains very much more than the mere proposition to tax imitation butter 10 cents a pound. It undertakes the inspection of all these goods under the supervision of Government officers, and properly stamping them so that they can not be sold to consumers without the consumers' knowledge as to what they are and what they are not. I understand the Senator to be in favor of that proposition at the outset, and I have no doubt we shall all be in favor of doing as much as that.

I do not care to go into any discussion this morning as to the propriety of this tax. I shall do that when the measure properly comes before the Senate and not before.

We are receiving from day to day petitions from thousands and tens of thousands of the small farmers scattered all over this country asking substantially for this legislation or for some measure of relief. We have received protests already from a few individuals engaged in this infamous trade of the manufacture of imitation goods, butterine and oleomargarine. The manufacture is confined, however, to a very few persons in this country, perhaps not more than fifty or one hundred establishments; I do not know the exact number. These manufacturers have suddenly awakened to a sense and a knowledge that the people of this country propose in some way, and in some proper way, to put this manufacture under control, so that the people of the country shall know what they are buying, and shall prevent all kinds of fraud or imitations being put upon the people.

When the House of Representatives shall have acted upon this question, if not before, the Committee on Agriculture will undertake to formulate the matter, and then, if it shall in its wisdom see fit to report a bill here favoring a tax, it may probably be wise for the Committee on Finance to consider it. But it is well known to this body that the whole question of the taxation and control under law of imitation butter has been considered by a similar committee in the House, and has been reported to the House without the action of the ordinary committee, the Committee on Ways and Means, which controls the matter of taxation.

Mr. CONGER. I ask if this debate is in order under the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order under the rule on the motion to refer, but the motion to refer the petition to the Committee on Finance having been withdrawn, the petition will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. The Chair can not restrain debate on a motion to refer.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, moved their indefinite postponment; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 419) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at said place for educational purposes; and

A bill (S. 1659) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., except that portion that lies westward of a line 50 feet east of the center of the railroad track of the Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railroad Company, to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at said place for educational purposes.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution of the Legislature of Georgia in relation to the payment of the Trezevant claim to that State, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2457) for the relief of the State of Georgia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GEORGE. I should state that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] does not agree with this report.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill (S. 2209) for the erection of a milling-shop at the national armory, Springfield, Mass., was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee has considered the bill and approves it, but instructs me to report it with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, so that the substance of it may be incorporated in the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the report will be agreed to, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Select Committee on Coast Defenses, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments:

A bill (S. 662) to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern army ordnance, armor, and other army purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern army warfare; and

A bill (S. 663) to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern naval ordnance, armor, shafting, and other naval purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern naval warfare.

Mr. HAWLEY. By leave of the Senate I will submit a report later.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1458) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan at Bay City, in said district, reported it without amendment.

THE MENHADEN FISHERY.

Mr. PALMER. I am instructed by the Committee on Fisheries to ask that 400 copies of certain statements made before that committee on the subject of the menhaden fishery be printed for the use of that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

SOUTH PASS OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. GIBSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report favorably and to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 7207) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1886, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at South Pass of Mississippi River.

There is a report here from the Secretary of War and from the Chief of Engineers asking that the appropriation be made.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $6,492 to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1886, for examinations and surveys required by the acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain the depth of water and width of channel secured and maintained from time to time by James B. Eads at South Pass of the Mississippi River and to enable the Secretary of War to report to Congress during the maintenance of the work.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reported by the Senator from Louisiana is the House print. The identical bill referred to the committee should be here, if practicable.

Mr. GIBSON. I supposed it was the identical bill. It was handed me by a member of the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will treat it as such. The question is on ordering the bill to a third reading.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM L. DUNLOP, TRUSTEE.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 79) for the relief of William L. Dunlop, trustee, direct me to report it with a recommendation that it pass, and I ask the consent of the Senate to consider it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the United States, in favor of the said William L. Dunlop, of the District of Columbia, as trustee of the estate of George Lowry, late of said District, deceased, his heirs and assigns, hereby surrender, abandon, and forever release all right or claim they may have, by reason of any escheat, to any part of lot numbered 13, in square numbered 75, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, as the same is known and distinguished on the plan or plat of said city, and included in the following lines and bounds, to wit: Beginning for the same at a point on the line of the southwest side of Pennsylvania avenue 79 feet 3 inches from the stone planted at the northwest corner of the square, and running thence along the line of Pennsylvania avenue toward said corner-stone 20 feet; thence at right angles to the avenue back to an alley 9 feet wide, heretofore laid off in a lease to Thomas Y. Sprogell; thence with the line of said alley due east till it intersects with said Sprogell's line; thence with said Sprogell's line to the place of beginning, with the free use and privilege of the said alley of 9 feet in width, and with the brick dwelling-house and buildings thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTH AMERICAN COMMISSION REPORTS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution for printing additional copies of the reports of the South American Commission, to report it favorably and to ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 additional copies of the Reports of the South American Commission, Executive Document 226, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, and Executive Document 50, Forty-ninth Congress, first session; of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

REPORT ON INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution for printing additional copies of the report on the Interoceanic Canal, to report it favorably and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the report of Mr. Menocal on the Interoceanic Canal, Senate Executive Document No. 99, first session Forty-ninth Congress; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Navy Department; and such additional number shall contain the plates, maps, and photographic illustrations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator why he confines the maps to the 2,000 copies for the use of the Navy Department? Why not include the maps in all?

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think that is the wording of the resolution. It applies to all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The map will be printed with the 5,000 additional copies.

Mr. BUTLER. The language of the resolution did not so strike me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of drawings and report of a recent survey of the Nicaraguan Canal route made by Engineer A. G. Menocal, United States Navy; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

ALASKA FRONTIER LINE.

Mr. MANDERSON. There came to the Senate yesterday a message from the President on the subject of the boundary line between Alaska and British Columbia. Accompanying the message of the President there is a report of the Secretary of State. Upon an examination of the report I find that it is very voluminous, and that accompanying it are quite a number of publications, among them one by the Coast Survey, which contains a large number of plates the printing of which would be a very great expense. By the action of the Senate yesterday not only was the message of the President ordered to be printed but also the accompanying papers. I move now to reconsider the vote by which the accompanying papers were ordered to be printed, and to refer the papers accompanying the message to the Printing Committee for their consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska, from the Committee on Printing, moves to reconsider the action of the Senate yesterday taken, that the documents referred to by him be printed. If there be no objection that order will be reconsidered and the documents will be referred to the Committee on Printing. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PORT OF ENTRY AT PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Commerce I report favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1393) to extend the limits of the port of Portland as a port of entry. The bill is favorably recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered now. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the limits of the port of Portland, in the State of Oregon, as a port of entry, be, and the same are hereby, extended so as to include all that portion of the east bank of the Willamette River lying opposite to the city of Portland, for a distance of 1 mile in width, and extending from the south boundary line of the corporate limits of the city of Portland down said east bank of said river to a point directly opposite to the lower end of Swan Island, in said river.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after the date of its passage.

By unanimous consent the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the Calendar be taken up and that it be disposed of in regular order. I think that is fair to all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not yet closed.

Mr. MAXEY. I thought the Calendar had been reached, as several bills have been passed by unanimous consent.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6391) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (by request), introduced a bill (S. 2458) for the relief of C. H. Fristoe, Simon Shultice, John J. Sumpter, and George W. Baxter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 2461) granting an increase of pension to Philip Kirschner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2462) granting a pension to Helen A. Beebe, a volunteer nurse in the United States service during the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2463) granting a pension to H. D. Hobbs; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2464) extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to certain suits for the use of patents and patented inventions against the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2466) for the relief of Samuel E. Nichols; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2467) granting a pension to John S. Coleman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2468) for the relief of Lewis Bitlick; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2471) making an appropriation for the building of a new light-house at Milwaukee, Wis.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2472) for the organization of the Territory of Alaska, and to provide for the establishment of a civil government therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2473) supplementary to and amendatory of section 1342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. CALL, Mr. HOAR, Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, and Mr. SAULSBURY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them severally to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BONDS OF EXECUTORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is in order, and the first case on the Calendar will be announced.

Mr. CALL. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed the bill (S. 1422) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia. I find that the House has passed a bill precisely the same, in the same words, and, if my motion is granted, I shall ask that the House bill be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to reconsider its action upon the bill named by him, stating that a bill precisely the same has been passed by the House of Representatives. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the bill was passed is reconsidered. The House bill will be read.

Mr. CALL. It is House bill 7879.

Mr. CONGER. That bill is not on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Florida that the bill is not yet on the Calendar, and the motion to proceed to its consideration will have to be postponed.

Mr. CALL. If it be in order I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be reported back to the Senate without delay, inasmuch as it is precisely, word for word, the same as the Senate bill which was passed yesterday. The House bill is now pending before the committee to which it was referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee was it referred?

Mr. CALL. To the Committee on the District of Columbia. "H. R. 7879. Read twice and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, May 11, 1886." It is precisely word for word the same as the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from the further consideration of the bill he has named, which he will be kind enough to send to the desk that it may be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (H. R. 7879) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. What is the object? I did not understand the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. The Committee on the District of Columbia reported Senate bill 1422, being the same as this House bill, a bill relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia. It is the same, word for word, as the bill from the House.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator give bond that those bills are identical in language?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir; they are just word for word the same bill. I have here the Senate bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I should doubt that unless the Senator himself has made the comparison.

Mr. CALL. I have read the bills.

Mr. INGALLS. The matter was called to my attention at the last meeting of the District Committee, and it appeared upon an inspection and comparison that the language of the bills was not identical. Therefore, unless there has been some change meanwhile, or some modification, or unless I am laboring under a mistake, the Senator from Florida is not as accurate as he usually is.

Mr. CALL. There may be some immaterial difference, and as the chairman of the committee makes that point I will withdraw the motion, but I have no doubt that the bills are identical.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

STATEN ISLAND BRIDGE BILL.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like the privilege of making a statement before the motion is put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to this matter. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCPHERSON. My colleague [Mr. SEWELL] has been necessarily called away to-day by reason of illness in his family, I understand. He is very much interested in this bill and would like to be present when it is considered. I ask that it go over without prejudice until to-morrow morning. I think my colleague will be here to-morrow. I should not like to have the Senate consider the bill in his absence.

I understand also that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is absent likewise, takes some interest in the bill and would like to be present when it is considered. Therefore I ask that the bill may go over until to-morrow without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition made by the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Maine has unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. This bill will occupy more than the remainder of this morning hour. If I did not know that it would, I should not move now to proceed to its consideration notwithstanding the objection. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] informed me that they both would be here to-morrow morning, and it seems to me they will be here in ample season to take part in the discussion of the bill, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] might proceed this morning. That is the only reason I urge the matter.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask permission to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] certainly desired that that bill should not be called up to-day, and his understanding was that it would not be.

Mr. MCPHERSON. He left here with that understanding.

Mr. PLUMB. I know he left the city with that understanding, and I think it would be manifestly unfair in regard to a matter affecting his State that it should be taken up during his absence.

Mr. CONGER. I understand the motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate gave unanimous consent to the Senator from Kansas to speak.

Mr. CONGER. The announcement was made in so low a voice that I did not hear it. I stand here to object to all violations of the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made——

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to say one word more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent of the Senate to address the Senate upon this subject.

Mr. CONGER. I shall not object now after what has occurred.

Mr. FRYE. I am entirely willing that this bill shall go over until to-morrow morning provided I can have unanimous consent to take it up to-morrow morning. I ask unanimous consent to have this bill considered to-morrow morning.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will yield to me one moment I will say that I will consent to have the bill come up at any time if my colleague is present, and I expect him here to-morrow morning. I have no knowledge that he will be absent longer than to-day; but I hope the Senator from Maine will not press the consideration of the bill in my colleague's absence, as it is a matter in which he feels a deep interest, and in which the people of New Jersey feel a deep interest.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator told me he would be here to-morrow morning.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If he is here then I shall not object. I do not mean to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up to-morrow morning for consideration.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to that.

Mr. FRYE. I move then that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. PLUMB called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). On this motion I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. If he were present I should vote "yea," and I understand he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. INGALLS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have been requested to pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is absent and who would vote against this motion. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is necessarily detained from the Senate Chamber by illness. He is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. CAMDEN (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who is necessarily absent to-day; I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Berry,	Cullom,	Hale,	Mitchell of Oreg.,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Harris,	Sawyer,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. FRYE. One moment.

Mr. HARRISON. I rose to make a request for unanimous consent that this bill might retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. That is what I was going to ask.

Mr. HARRISON. Many of us voted against the consideration of the bill on account of the statement that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] was absent because of illness; and under those circumstances, for one I did not feel that it was right to proceed to the consideration of the bill, but I am in favor of the bill and in favor of its early consideration. Therefore I ask that it may retain its place on the Calendar for to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call attention to Report No. 1082, accompanying the bill (S. 778) to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war for the Union. On page 2, in the twenty-seventh line, the word "not" should be struck out, and on page 3, in the twenty-second line, the word "deceased" should be "diseased." These errors make the report read awkwardly, and I ask for an order that the Public Printer may reprint it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order to reprint will be made.

ADMINISTRATOR OF RICHARD FITZPATRICK.

Mr. BUTLER. Before proceeding to the next bill on the Calendar I ask that Order of Business 670, being the bill (S. 502) for the relief of T. M. English, administrator of Richard Fitzpatrick, be withdrawn from the Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of order. I am unable to hear what is said. Things may be said and done that we in this part of the House do not know. I ask that order may be preserved, so that what is being said and done may be known.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will resume their seats. The Senator from South Carolina was not heard by the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER. I repeat. I ask that Order of Business 670, being the bill (S. 502) for the relief of T. M. English, administrator of Richard Fitzpatrick, reported by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], April 14, 1886, from the Committee on Claims adversely, be taken from the Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Claims. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the bill named by him be recommitted to the Committee on Claims. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

DISTRICT POLICE REGULATIONS.

The bill (S. 1339) to amend the police regulations of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "therefor," to insert "by the police authorities of the District;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever any female under the age of twenty-one years shall be found in any house of ill-repute, or soliciting vice upon the streets or elsewhere, she may be arrested therefor by the police authorities of the District, and, under the order of the police court of the District of Columbia, be sent to the House of the Good Shepherd, in the city of Washington, in said District, and be there required to labor at some suitable employment and to receive instruction and practical training; and for the support of such females in said institution, and in consideration of the agreement of said institution to receive said females, the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to said institution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALIFORNIA SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed yesterday the bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands. Perhaps the bill should be amended. I do not care to press the motion now; I only want to have it entered now, so that the bill may be subjected to inspection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has gone to the House of Representatives. Does the Senator ask for its return?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered, and the bill will be recalled from the House of Representatives.

REGISTERS TO FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

The bill (S. 805) to authorize certain foreign-built steamships in the service of the International Navigation Company to be registered as vessels of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRYE. I object to the consideration of that.

Mr. CONGER. Then it goes over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under Rule IX.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask that Senate bill 805 may go over without prejudice, not losing its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. That bill can not be considered in the morning hour.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not ask to have the bill considered, only that it may go over without prejudice.

Mr. CONGER. I think it had better go under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will take its place on the Calendar under Rule IX.

TRUSTEES OF DISTRICT REFORM SCHOOL.

The bill (S. 1587) in relation to the trustees of the Reform School of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter the chief clerk of the Department of Justice shall be, ex officio, a trustee of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, with all the powers, privileges, and duties of other trustees of the school.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCOUNTS WITH RAILWAY COMPANIES.

The bill (S. 511) to provide for the settlement of accounts with certain railway companies was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. That embraces a large variety of subjects, and has been a matter of considerable discussion and examination before committees. I do not think it can be settled in the morning hour with justice either to the companies or to the Government. It provides for a settlement and payment of balances.

Mr. BROWN. I ask unanimons consent to make a very short statement and I think the Senator will not make the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to make a statement in respect to this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWN. At the conclusion of the war there was a very large amount of railroad rolling-stock in the hands of the Government that had been used in what were known as the rebel States. The gauge there was 5 feet and the gauge over the North and West was 4 feet 8½ inches. The rolling-stock had been made in a hurry, as the exigencies of the Government required. It was not, therefore, of very superior quality. There was over $7,000,000 worth of it, and the Government wanted to get rid of it. The rolling-stock had been destroyed on so many of the Southern railroads that they were obliged to take rolling-stock on any terms they could get it.

It was very important to the whole country that commerce should be reopened and transportation revived between the two sections of the Union. A board was appointed to value this rolling-stock and let the different roads have it. As reported again and again here in different reports from the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, the rolling-stock was valued at a price in many instances higher than the Government originally gave for it, and it was generally admitted to be valued at at least 25 per cent. above its value if it had been put on the block and sold for cash.

In 1871 Congress passed an act that applied to a number of these railroads giving them a reduction which amounted to 25 per cent. Again, in 1875, another act was passed relieving another batch of the roads, and they got the same reduction of 25 per cent. on the amount of the valuation which had been put on the rolling-stock by the commissioners. In 1877 the last act was passed that has been enacted on the subject, which applied to the Western and Atlantic Railroad of Georgia, and it received the same reduction of 25 per cent.

So then there has been a reduction allowed by three different acts passed by the Congress of the United States. The reductions up to 1877, as stated in Mr. Hartridge's report from the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, amounted to over $5,000,000 on the original investment and there was only a little over $7,000,000 of the whole original investment. Therefore five-sevenths of it has already been acted on, and that allowed to the Western and Atlantic Railroad is to be added to the amount, so that the great bulk of it has already been settled on that particular plan.

There was an act passed that referred to the Mobile and Ohio road that was the same as the others, allowing the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General in their discretion to make a settlement at a reduction of not more than 25 per cent.; but it was found that that company had paid within a small per cent. of the entire investment, so that if the settlement was made on 25 per cent. there would be a balance due to the company, and there was no appropriation to meet that balance, and therefore they could not make the settlement. The matter was reported back, and during the last Congress, as I recollect, and I think correctly, a bill was passed by the Senate for the relief of that particular company, but I think it was not reached and acted on in the other House. Every report that I have learned anything about that has been made on this question from first to last has always been favorable to the settlement.

This bill covers the rest of the companies in one measure, so that that shall be the end of it, and gives two years within which the adjustment and settlement may be made; and after that, as I understand, if any company does not apply it will be barred by the statute of limitations. It provides, also, that where the payment has been made, as in the case of the Mobile and Ohio Company, for more than 75 per cent. of the whole amount, then the balance may be refunded to the company, so as to put them all on the same basis. We simply ask now that the remaining companies shall be settled with on the same basis that has been allowed to nearly six-sevenths of the whole amount up to this time, and let that dispose of the whole question. Otherwise, bills will continue to come in here in behalf of each one of the three or four companies still left behind. This will dispose of the entire question, leaving the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General to look into and investigate the whole matter.

In that state of the case I appeal to my friend from Michigan to withdraw the objection and let this bill pass.

Mr. CONGER. I think the very statement shows that this ought not to be left to two men and money appropriated out of the Treasury without something before Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. BROWN. Relief has been granted in cases of like character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is passed over.

Mr. BROWN. The bill I suppose will go on the other Calendar under the objection. I appeal to the Senator now to consent that it may retain its place on this Calendar, and ask him to look into the report and satisfy himself before it comes up again. I am sure if the Senator will read the report and look into the whole matter he will have no objection. I simply ask that the bill be permitted to retain its place without prejudice on this Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. It will be subject to the same objection when it comes up again?

Mr. BROWN. Of course it will be.

Mr. CONGER. Then I shall not object that it shall hold its place.

Mr. BROWN. I simply ask that it hold its place, and I ask the Senator to be kind enough to read the report and then I think he will waive all objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made as requested by the Senator from Georgia.

JAMES D. REMY.

The bill (S. 736) granting a pension to James D. Remy, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This, being reported adversely, will be placed on the Calendar under Rule IX.

TIMOTHY KIBBY.

The bill (S. 775) granting arrears of pension to Timothy Kibby, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This, being reported adversely, the same order will be made.

OFFICERS OF SIGNAL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 976) for the relief of certain officers of the Signal Service was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the expenses of operating and keeping in repair the northwestern section of the United States military telegraph lines (from Bismarck to Fort Ellis, and connections), constructed under the act of Congress approved June 20, 1878, which, between the 20th of June, 1878, and the 30th of June, 1883, may have been paid out of moneys received from dispatches sent over that section, be authorized and allowed; and the several officers making such payments are entitled to and shall receive proper credit therefor upon examination of their respective accounts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. K. BELDING.

Mr. SPOONER. When Order of Business 251, Senate bill 127, was reached by the Senate yesterday I was out of the Chamber, and it was passed over with the understanding, as I am informed, that it should not be displaced on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to take it up.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that it be now taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate take up the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 127) for the relief of H. K. Belding. It provides for the payment of $1,566 to H. K. Belding, of Minnesota, for carrying the mails of the United States between the years 1858 and 1862.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. SPOONER. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that this claim has been reported upon favorably by a number of committees. It was reported favorably by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives at the first sessions of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses. It was reported favorably by the Committee on Claims of the Senate in the last Congress and passed both Houses, but passed too late to be presented in time to the President for his signature. The report of the Committee on Claims is unanimous.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri ask for the reading of the report?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let part of it be read at least that we may see what it is.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. SPOONER February 24, 1886, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 127) for the relief of H. K. Belding, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

This claim was reported upon favorably by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives at the first session of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses, and was reported upon favorably, with amendment, at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress. It was also reported upon favorably by the Senate Committee on Claims at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress.

The last-named report was as follows:

"They find that said H. K. Belding was contractor on mail route No. 13585, from Brownsville, Minn., to Carimona, in the same State; that the contract was for four years from July 1, 1858. The contract price for carrying the mail on this route was $1,800 per annum. Mr. Belding performed the service under the contract until May, 1859, and was paid the contract price therefor. In 1859 there was a failure of sufficient appropriation for this route, and an order was issued by the Post-Office Department reducing the service on the same one-third.

"There was some correspondence between the contractor and the Post-Office Department about continuing the full service, and the contractor was informed there was no objection, except there was no money to pay until Congress convened and made an appropriation.

"Mr. Belding did perform full service from May 1, 1859, to October, 1860, and has received but two-thirds of the contract price therefor, and claims that having rendered the service in good faith he should receive the full compensation named in his contract.

"This full service was performed for seventeen months after the order of reduction, and at the contract rate Mr. Belding should have received $150 per month. He did not receive but $100 per month, and he asks to be paid $50 per month additional, or $850 for the service so performed.

"The service having been performed with the knowledge of the Department and for the manifest benefit of the community, the committee think it just and equitable that Mr. Belding should be paid for the service actually performed the contract price for the same.

"They therefore recommend the payment to Mr. Belding of the sum of $850 for the seventeen months of service as above stated.

"Mr. Belding makes an additional claim, and the committee find the following facts:

"Prior to the 1st of October, 1860, the route from Brownsville to Carimona was extended, and the contract with Belding annulled. Mr. Belding complained to the Department that he had left a good business and made large investments to perform his contract, and would suffer very great injury if compelled to give it up. He was informed that he would be reinstated and his contract renewed. The service at this time was lessened 5 miles at one end of the route and increased 12 miles at the other, and the compensation was increased $110 per year.

"Negotiations continued between Mr. Belding and the Post-Office Department from October 1, 1860, to February 14, 1861, four months and fourteen days, when the contract was renewed with Mr. Belding. During this four months and fourteen days Mr. Belding performed the service and has received no pay therefor. This route over which Mr. Belding performed the service had been included in a much larger one and let to other parties. They never performed any service upon it, but collected the pay under their contract for the service performed by Mr. Belding.

"It clearly appearing that the original contract with Mr. Belding was annulled for no fault or omission on his part; that he continued to perform the service in good faith under the assurance that he would be reinstated; that his doing so was well known to the Post-Office Department, and that he was subsequently reinstated, we are of the opinion that the payment to other parties for this service, under the circumstances, should not relieve the Government from paying Mr. Belding therefor. We therefore report back the bill without amendment, said bill including payment of the two sums allowed by the committee, and recommend that the bill pass."

Your committee concur in the above report and recommendations, and recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think there is any justice in that portion of the claim increasing it from $850. The $850 seems to be a meritorious and just claim. The balance is a payment due this man, but which the Government has at some time paid to other parties who seemed to be entitled to it. I think it is a double payment, which is neither just nor right. I move an amendment in line 5 of the bill by striking out $1,566 and inserting $850.

Mr. SPOONER. It is true as stated by the Senator from Missouri that the Government paid another party for the service mentioned in this last item, but it was improperly paid, and this claimant, then a very old man, performed the service. There is no question about that, and he performed the service acceptably to the public and with the knowledge of the Department. The fact that the Government erroneously paid some other party ought not to preclude him from receiving the sum to which he is equitably entitled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVIDSON DICKSON AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 290) for the relief of Davidson Dickson and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to the following-named persons, or to their legal representatives, of the amounts due on their contracts with the United States, as appears by certified accounts on file in the Treasury Department, namely: to Davidson Dickson, $40; to W. B. Daniels, $28; to J. C. McCrary, $12.50; to A. Pike, $100; to James A. Ralston, $771.25; to E. E. Rawson, $246.33; to M. Sparks, $100; and to trustees of Odd Fellows' Lodge, Pulaski, Tenn., $64.16.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 13, before the name "James A. Ralston," to insert "estate of;" so as to read:

To estate of James A. Ralston, $771.25.

Mr. CONGER. Will some one state what these services were for and when they occurred? I will not ask for the reading of the report, if some one will state what the services were and when they were rendered.

Mr. GRAY. I ask to have the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GRAY March 3, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 290) for the relief of Davidson Dickson and others, submit the following report:

The claims made by the respective parties mentioned in the bill, to wit, Davidson Dickson, W. B. Daniels, J. C. McCrary, A. Pike, James A. Ralston's estate, E. E. Rawson, M. Sparks, and the trustees of the Odd Fellow's Lodge, Pulaski, Tenn., are all for rent. In support of their claims they file the original vouchers which they received, and in each one of which the certifying officer certifies that the United States is debtor to the party named for rent of certain described premises for the sum named in the bill; that the account is correct and just; that the services were rendered as stated; that they were necessary for the public service and are reported as required by the Army Regulations. These vouchers are all in duplicate on form 22, as prescribed by the said regulations.

All of the said accounts have been presented to the Third Auditor for settlement and have been disallowed by him for the reason that by the act of February 21, 1867 (volume 14, United States Statutes at Large, page 397), it is provided that the act of July 4, 1864, shall not be construed to authorize the settlement of any claim for supplies or stores taken or furnished for the use of or used by the armies of the United States, nor for the occupation of or injury to real estate, nor for the consumption, appropriation, or destruction of or damage to personal property by the military authorities or troops of the United States, where such claim originated during the war for the suppression of the Southern rebellion in a State or part of a State declared in insurrection by the proclamation of the President of the United States dated July 1, 1862, or in a State in which, by an ordinance of secession, attempted to withdraw from the United States Government.

Under said act of February 21, 1867, the Departments have declined to pay any claims originating in the insurrectionary States from the beginning of the insurrection to the date of the President's proclamation declaring the insurrection at an end, whether such claims arose under contract or otherwise. And thus all persons whose just claims are based upon an express contract between themselves and the proper officers of the Government, made within the limits of the insurrectionary States, are forced to appeal to Congress for relief.

These claims arose out of contracts between the claimants and quartermasters, which were duly reported by such quartermaster, and claimants are, in our opinion, entitled to the amounts specified in their said vouchers and named in the bill.

Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, inserting the words "estate of" before the words "James A. Ralston," in the thirteenth line.

Mr. CONGER. I do not find in the report anything in regard to the character of these men or the manner of taking the property.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. COCKRELL. One moment. I happen to be familiar with this class of cases. They are claims for rent after the actual close of hostilities, where contracts were made between the parties, and no questions of loyalty came up at all, and were reported for allowance; but Congress in 1867 passed the act of February 21, which prevented the Departments from paying them, and the Departments simply refused to pay them. As they are right, the only relief is here. I suppose there have been fifty such bills passed.

Mr. CONGER. I think these cases were familiar to me for years back in the House. The time has passed, however, for this bill to-day. Let it go over until to-morrow.

WILLIAM P. SQUIRES.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to ask the reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1227) granting an increase of pension to William P. Squires. Without attention being called to it, the Senate concurred in the House amendment. I desire to have that vote reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to have it reconsidered at this time, and the bill with the amendment referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent that it may be disposed of. It is a small matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote by which the amendment of the House of Representatives was concurred in will be reconsidered, and the bill, with the amendment, will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER. Now I want to know what the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska submitted a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate on concurring in a House amendment to a pension bill with a view to have it referred to the Committee on Pensions. That order has been made.

Mr. CONGER. All right.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. COKE. I gave notice yesterday that at the conclusion of the morning hour to-day I would ask unanimous consent of the Senate to lay aside temporarily the pending order for the purpose of taking up House bill 7479 (Order of Business 553) in order that I might submit some remarks upon it. I now make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CONGER. The request was not heard here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the pending business be informally laid aside that he may make some remarks on another subject. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide a method for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill as it came from the House, because I believe it the best, with one or two amendments which will be proposed, that our present experience enables us to formulate. After a while we may and doubtless will be able to do better, but I have heard no suggestion of what seems to me to be an improvement as yet. There is nothing compulsory in this bill; it contemplates only voluntary action. It proceeds on the assumption that both labor and capital are averse to conflict as disastrous and dangerous to both, and desirous of harmony as being in the interest of both, and offers the only means yet suggested of compromising difficulties between the organizations representing these great forces—that of arbitration—the Government agreeing to pay the expenses of the proceedings. In the very nature of the case there is, and can be, nothing compulsory in such a proceeding, and therefore there is nothing coercive in the bill. The submission to arbitration, and every subsequent step contemplated by the bill, even to a compliance with the award, is purely voluntary, and necessarily so, because specific performance would be impossible of enforcement upon either party.

The laws as they now stand and are administered in the courts are framed to meet every conceivable case where compulsion is necessary, and the executive officers of the State and National Governments are ready to enforce them under the mandate of the courts. This field is already fully occupied by a system of jurisprudence the growth of many centuries, which justly claims to furnish a remedy for the assertion of every right and a method of redress for every wrong, with ample power to enforce its judgments and decrees. It is outside of this field that this bill proposes to operate. The matter of individual and corporate rights and wrongs and the methods of redress it is true are incidentally involved, but are not the primary objects proposed to be acted on.

The great contests between organized capital and organized labor as represented by railroad corporations and their employés engaged in interstate commerce, to which alone the provisions of the House bill are applicable, involve interests vastly greater than those of the immediate parties to the conflicts, and these are the interests of the great public whose commerce and system of exchange, upon the orderly administration and flow of which the comfort and happiness and fortunes of millions may and does depend, is not infrequently obstructed and impaired, if not destroyed, by them. Recent experience in the Southwest proves the necessity for some measure of protection for the interests of the public against the disastrous results certain to follow a widespread collision between organized labor and capital. The States can preserve the peace within their borders. The State courts can try and condemn and punish for violations of criminal laws, and by their judgments and decrees can adjust and settle civil rights of action, but there is no remedy for the wrong done the general public, upon whom falls the great bulk of the damage resulting from these disturbances. It makes no difference which party is right or which is wrong, the damage to the public is inevitable and the same.

The highest public interest, as well as the best interest of both labor and capital, is to be found in harmonious relations and mutual confidence between the two, and any measure which is a single step in the direction of promoting this end, such as arbitration proposed by this bill, is worthy of a fair trial. It is in the interest of the laborer whose union or organization has no standing in court, and can not plead or be impleaded in prosecution or defense of his individual rights, and whose poverty can not brook the expense and delay of litigation in courts against the wealth and power of great corporations. The tribunal established by the bill recognizes the union, the organization of labor, and permits and invites its representation of its individual members, giving to each of them the protection of the power of the whole, which is denied in the courts where each individual must stand on the merits of his own case. Nor is it less in the best interest of capital which finds its widest margins and most profitable fields, where labor is the best cared for and is consequently the most contented. And it is in the promotion of harmony and healthful co-operation between labor and capital by the peaceful arbitration and settlement of differences that strikes and disturbances are averted and avoided with all their resultant injury to the public, as well as the parties directly concerned.

The bill is founded, and as I believe properly, upon the theory that public opinion, the great arbiter and lawmaker and executive of laws in this country, is the only tribunal competent to deal with the contentions between the labor organizations and the railroad corporations. It will not do to say that we have courts, State and Federal, and marshals and sheriffs, and all the equipments for enforcing law and preserving order in a perfect state of organization and operation, and that nothing else is necessary, for we all know that something more is necessary. Stubborn facts, such as have recently transpired in Missouri, Illinois, and Texas, prove a necessity for some means which shall prevent such violent disturbances of the peace and such obstructions of the commerce of the country. After they have commenced, with the attendant bloodshed and destruction of property, and damage to all the material interests of the country, the ordinary and extraordinary powers of the judicial and executive branches of the State and National Governments, are admitted to be ample for their suppression and for bringing violaters of law to justice and punishment, but we all know that these do not prevent such troubles, for they do occur; and besides labor strikes are not only possible but of frequent occurrence, in which no law is violated, a perfectly lawful concerted cessation of labor unaccompanied by violence or intimidation, but which nevertheless paralyzes the business of the country and inflicts great damage on the public as well as loss on the parties directly concerned.

The object of this bill is to prevent their occurrence, by providing a peaceful and reasonable method of compromising differences. With a remedy by arbitration always open and accessible, public opinion will demand and coerce a resort to it. Neither party will dare decline a tender by the other of investigation and arbitration. To do so would be a confession of wrong, and would drive public opinion to the support of the other side. Neither capital nor labor can antagonize public opinion, and neither will do it, for it is well known to the representatives of both that either with public opinion on its side, would score an easy victory over the other. The investigation provided for by the bill would turn light on the subject of difference and enable the public to determine and locate the right and the wrong of it. The award of the board of arbitrators provided for would carry with it a moral force and the approval of a public opinion which would irresistibly compel its performance. In these considerations is found a conclusive answer to the objection that the bill, containing no compulsory provision, and being purely voluntary in all its features, is destitute of force or effectiveness.

This objection is in my judgment clearly untenable. If the subject can not be dealt with in this way, it must be left as it is, to remedies already existing in the organization of our governments and courts, which, as we know, have repeatedly failed to protect the public against the consequences of the disturbances sought to be provided against. The object of this bill is to prevent and avert and provide against, the occurrence of conflicts between railroad corporations and their employés. Existing laws provide only for their suppression in the instances when the laws are violated, after they have occurred. This bill seeks to provide for maintaining intact the trained labor in the employment of railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce, by furnishing free of expense to either party a method of settling differences between them, while existing laws leave such differences to culminate in strikes and the cessation and disorganization of labor, to the obstruction and hindrance of commerce and the injury of the public, and does not then take cognizance of the subject unless violence or destruction of property is attempted.

This bill proposes intervention between the railroad corporations and their employés in the general public interest, and to prevent disturbances which inflict great public injury in the stoppage or impairment of the methods and processes of interstate commerce, a subject which, by express grant of the Constitution, is within the regulating power and control of Congress, and the intervention is that of a peacemaker, which interferes with no personal or individual right, and neither invades nor trespasses upon the rights of any State. I look in vain for the constitutional objections charged without specification or definition against this bill. It does not pretend to interfere with State laws, or the right of the States to deal as they now do with the individuals composing the labor organizations or the railroad corporations, or with the corporations themselves, for violations of State laws. It contemplates no single act derogatory to the power or dignity of the States. It touches no phase or aspect of the subject, which it is possible for State legislation to handle or control or regulate. It does not act upon persons or individuals. It assumes neither right nor power to dictate to the bodies intended to be acted on what they shall or shall not do. It leaves that to be determined by the parties themselves, who have agreed to abitrate, who will act in full view of a public opinion which has been enlightened by a thorough and impartial investigation, and which will be swift to condemn wrong and uphold the right. The operation of the bill is outside of the realm of positive law which deals with individuals—is outside of State jurisdiction and State laws and State rights. It deals only with moral forces. It appeals to that highest of all tribunals in this country, an intelligent, well-informed public opinion.

Nobody denies the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, and it does seem unquestionable that it is competent for Congress, in virtue of this power, to appropriate the money necessary to defray the expenses of arbitrations as provided for in this bill, to prevent and avert collisions which always hurtfully obstruct and frequently temporarily suspend or destroy interstate commerce. In virtue of the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes," granted in section 8, article 1 of the Constitution, and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," granted in the same article and section, we annually pass river and harbor bills appropriating millions of dollars for clearing out snags, shoals, and sand-bars in the interior water ways of the country so as to facilitate the transit of commerce and the means of intercommunication between the States, and for the same purpose, as well as the promotion of foreign commerce, to deepen, improve, and render safe and accessible our exterior ports and harbors.

Mr. Calhoun, strict constructionist that he was, freely admitted this power to be in Congress. Since the decision in the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, reported in 9 Wheaton, in which Chief-Justice Marshall discussed and illuminated every phase and aspect of the clause of the Constitution just read in, an opinion which from that day to this has been followed as the unquestioned law of the subject, it has been held that Congress possesses the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce in all its branches, and that this regulating power extends over all the agencies and instrumentalities and subjects and operations of commerce, whether on sea, in the interior rivers or lakes, or on land, whether in boats or vessels or on railroads; and by Chief-Justice Waite in Telegraph Company vs. Texas (105 United States Reports), that "a telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods;" that "both companies are instruments of commerce, and their business is commerce itself."

Mr. Justice Johnson, who delivered a concurring opinion in Gibbons vs. Ogden, said:

> Commerce in its simplest signification means an exchange of goods, but in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and the various mediums of exchange become commodities and enter into commerce; the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation.

In virtue of the regulating power of Congress over commerce, bills have been recently reported from the Commerce Committees of the two Houses of Congress, and are now pending, giving national aid to the construction of a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and a similar bill has been once before reported from the Commerce Committee of this body. The proposed assertion of this power in aid of the construction of a ship-railway in a foreign country for the purpose of uniting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, would seem to justify the language of Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in County of Mobile vs. Kimball (102 United States Reports), when he said, referring to the power of Congress to regulate commerce:

> That power is indeed without limitation. It authorizes Congress to prescribe the conditions upon which commerce in all its forms shall be conducted between our citizens, and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between the citizens of the several States and to adopt measures to promote its growth and insure its safety.

If Congress may constitutionally appropriate money to clear out and keep open and safe and navigable our rivers and harbors and lakes, to the end that the flow of commerce between the States shall be free and unobstructed, why may not money be appropriated as is done in this bill to pay the expenses of arbitrations to insure the safety, and provide against obstructions of commerce carried on land by rail? The power of Congress over the subject is the same whether the carriage is by land or by water, and that power has always been exerted by Congress to remove obstructions and perils and hindrances to commerce in any of its branches, and it can not be denied that the purpose of this bill is to guard that portion of the commerce of the country carried by rail, constituting as it does at least four-fifths of the whole, against embarrassing and hurtful interruption.

It is generally admitted that Congress has power to intervene between railroad corporations and shippers and passengers, and see to it that charges are reasonable, and this includes necessarily the power, if Congress chooses to exercise it, of prescribing what the charges shall be; and again that Congress has the power, if deemed wise to exercise it, as I believe it is, to prohibit a greater charge for a short than for a long haul. These and many other regulating provisions are to be found in the various interstate-commerce bills, which at one time and another have been discussed and passed, sometimes through one House and sometimes through the other of Congress, the two Houses never having yet concurred, however, in passing the same bill. These regulations assume that trains are running, that transportation is going on, that the car wheels are moving. If these stop, commerce is suspended, is pro tanto destroyed. To keep them moving would seem a primary and fundamental principle underlying all other regulations, because without it all other regulations are nugatory, and is therefore within the power of Congress, whenever that power may be exercised without trenching upon the rights of individuals, or the rights or powers of the States, neither of which I have shown is done in this bill.

With the single exception of appropriating money to pay the expense of arbitrating and settling differences between railroad corporations and their employés, in order to provide against strikes, and the consequent disorganization of the trained and expert labor on our great lines of transportation, to the detriment and hindrance of commerce, there is no exercise of power in this bill beyond the authority granted the board of arbitrators to summon and swear witnesses, &c. The award of the arbitrators is not to be entered as the judgment of any court, is not to be enforced by judicial or executive process, is simply to be publicly announced by the arbitrators and filed with and proclaimed by the Commissioner of Labor of the United States. An arbitration is defined in the law-books to be, "a proceeding by private and unofficial persons selected by the parties upon matters of difference submitted to them." In all the statutes I have ever seen or heard of providing for arbitration there are provisions for making the awards, judgments of courts, to be enforced as other judgments are, by regular judicial process.

This feature, for reasons I have indicated, is necessarily absent from this bill. The board of arbitrators having no power to enforce the award, and not even to adjudge costs against either party, for they are assumed by the Government, neither person nor property being affected in any legal sense by their action, are in no respect judicial officers, are only an advisory board, and the objection to the method of their appointment as being unconstitutional is clearly not well taken. The suggestion that a labor bureau of three commissioners be established here, and invested with the same powers proposed to be given arbitrators chosen by the parties themselves under the House bill does not meet the approval of my judgment. A fixed and permanent board, appointed by the President, to be a part of the executive branch of the Government, and residing in this at all times red-hot political center, could not fail to take on a distinct political character and complexion, when absolute nonpartisanship would be essential to its effectiveness.

This tribunal, located in this city, the focus and center of corporation influence and power, the theater of its greatest achievements, the field on which its great victories over the people in railroad, land, tariff, financial, and other class legislation have been won, surrounded on all sides by a demoralizing and undermining atmosphere, and, while thus domiciled in the very home and residence of one party, and under the very shadow of Wall street, is thousands of miles it may be from the other to be affected by the award and the public opinion to be enlightened by the investigation, would utterly fail, and justly too, to command the confidence of the laboring people or the country, and would therefore be a failure as a tribunal for voluntary arbitration of differences. Perfect fairness and impartiality between the parties in the constitution of the board of arbitration is an indispensable requisite to a successful operation of the plan, and this proposed permanent board located in Washington would be, although honestly intended otherwise, wholly to the advantage and in the interest of the corporations. For we can not suppose that three labor commissioners will withstand a power which it is well known has so often dominated not only Congress, but all the branches of the Government here, and if they should be able to do this, the impression that they would fall under corporation influence could not be removed, and would as effectually destroy their usefulness as if it were true. Such a board would at once assume the characteristics of a court in its proceedings and methods, and its bent and bias soon become known, and instead of going before it voluntarily, parties would prefer to go at once into the established judicial tribunals of the country. I believe every State in the Union has on its statute-book a law providing for the settlement of causes of action by arbitrators chosen by the parties themselves, and the object of all these laws is to enable parties, when they prefer, to select their own tribunal rather than go into the established courts.

The suggestion to take away from the parties the selection of the board of arbitrators and vest the power of choice elsewhere, and to establish the board thus chosen into a fixed and permanent one, seems to me to be destructive of the vital principle and theory of arbitration, and the erection of a new tribunal, which in its relation to this subject would possess all the vices and none of the virtues of the established courts. The proceeding by arbitration is eminently a domestic, home remedy, one dependent for its efficacy upon the moral influence of the fact that the award is made by arbitrators chosen by the parties themselves on account of their peculiar fitness for the business in hand, and this fitness comes usually from well-known high character as well as a thorough knowledge of the matter they are called on to arbitrate, and of all the facts and circumstances connected with it.

These considerations apply with unusual force to such contentions as we are now considering, when the character of labor required, and the cost of living and the res gestæ of the whole business involved in the particular case, ought to be familiar to those who sit as arbitrators. The differences and disturbances aimed to be met by the proposed legislation, if general over the country, could not be investigated by one board, and if local should always be investigated in the locality where the troubles occur. The bill passed by the House tenders to the parties at issue a remedy for the friendly settlement of their differences on the spot, without the delay of Washington bureau red tape, each party being authorized by its provisions to select one arbitrator, and the two arbitrators thus chosen to select a third as umpire.

The remedy is omnipresent, and wherever a difference occurs is there to settle and adjust it. We are endeavoring to devise a plan which will encourage and invite and assist a settlement of disputes between railroad corporations and their employés without delay, and the injury to the public and the immediate parties incident thereto, and it does seem clear to me that a provision which enables the parties to select their own arbitrators, men of their own choice, would induce and promote and accomplish this mode of settlement, and that the establishment of a fixed and permanent tribunal, remote from the field of disturbances, regardless of what might be the desire of either party, would repel and discourage it. While I do not propose to commit myself to all that has been said by the Supreme Court of the United States touching the power of Congress in the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, and especially mean, so far as my vote and action are concerned, here or elsewhere, to guard vigilantly against any interference with or invasion of the powers and duties and rights of the States by Federal authority, I can see nothing but what is in strict accord with the Constitution, and with the most liberal definition of State rights, in this bill as it came from the House. There is certainly no harm in the bill, and it may, and I believe will, if passed, accomplish a great deal of good. It is an experiment, of course, but one in my judgment well worthy of a fair trial.

Organization is the order of the day in every department of human industry. Labor organizations are the counterpart of organizations of capital. The latter have produced the former, and both are the natural outgrowth of a phenomenal increase in population, productiveness, and unequally distributed wealth. That these exciting causes will remain in a growing and increasing form, and will continue to stimulate and enlarge these organizations, can not be doubted, and it is equally unquestionable that the stronger and more widespread the organizations become the greater, will be the necessity for some measure for the settlement of differences between them. A law for this purpose can never be less necessary than it is now, with all the probabilities that it will be very much more necessary in the future. It does not meet the question to say, as has been said, that a remedy for the evils complained of may be found in an enforcement of existing laws, and an appeal to the ballot-box. The evils grew up under existing laws, and under the same ballot we now have. The people are the same, are moved by the same impulses, swayed by the same influences, imbued with the same passions and prejudices, and prompted by the same incentives that have always actuated them.

We must deal with the situation as it is, not as it might be or ought to be. The subject is one which can neither be ignored nor postponed. Philosophic discussions over the causes which have produced the existing condition of affairs, coupled with admonitions to the people that if they will be wiser and more virtuous in the use of the ballot they will be happier and better governed, have their uses. But this subject requires more definite and specific and rapid treatment, and the bill as it came from the House is the best suggestion of a remedy yet made, in my judgment.

The railroad statistics brought up to the end of the year 1884 by Mr. Henry V. Poor in his railroad manual, show the total number of miles of railroad in the United States up to that time to have been 125,379, more than 45 per cent. of the railroad mileage of the world. And the astonishing statement is made in the able and exhaustive report of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce submitted to the Senate on the 18th of January last, on the authority of Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Massachusetts, that "the railway property of the country constitutes one-fifth part of the accumulated capital of the country to-day," and it is further stated in that report that "there are 650,000 people employed in that service in the mere mechanism of the distribution of products, without reference to those employed in construction," and that the railroads of the United States move about 400,000,000 tons a year, half of which is food and fuel." These facts illustrate with unanswerable force the magnitude and importance of the subject we are now considering. The rapidity with which these facts are being intensified and enlarged may be determined by the following, which I read from the same report:

The average number of population to 1 mile of road completed by decades has been as follows: In 1840, 6,191; in 1850, 2,705; in 1860, 1,087; in 1870, 784; and in 1880, 571.

And still the work of railroad building goes on with unabated vigor. In the face of facts like these, no higher duty rests upon Congress than to the extent of its constitutional power to provide against any hindrance from any source of a commerce in which all the people of the United States are so vitally interested, millions of them even dependent upon it for such absolute necessaries of life as food and fuel—a provision demanded no less in the interest of the great army of laboring people engaged in this commerce, and of the owners of the vast capital invested in it, than in that of the great public they are serving.

It may be assumed as a fixed and settled fact that the power to regulate a commerce between the States and Territories of this Union, so vast in its proportions, and so interwoven with the routine business and every-day life of all the people as to be a part and parcel of it, as is that carried on the railroad lines of this country, will be maintained as a proper function of Government, and that both the State and National Governments, each acting within the sphere of constitutional power, are required by the people to put forth and exercise when necessary all their power to the end that this commerce shall go on unobstructed, unhindered, and unimpeded by dissensions between those engaged in carrying it on. This much is unquestionably demanded by the country, and nothing less will be accepted. Railroad corporations are public servants and will be held to a rigid accountability for the performance of their duties as common carriers, and ought to be, strike or no strike, and those who obstruct them in discharge of those duties by the injury or destruction of property or by unlawful violence, or threats of violence, will and ought to be sternly dealt with as criminal violators of the laws of the state.

The public interest is supreme and paramount, and this requires that the flow of commerce shall be free, and shall not be obstructed either by default or design. Nobody questions the right of any man, or any number of men, to throw down their implements and cease work at any time that he or they may desire or choose to do so. Nor can it be questioned that others willing to do the work have the legal and moral right with the consent of the employer, to take the vacated places and perform the labor free from violence or intimidation. A government which would fail to protect its citizens in the enjoyment of these unquestioned rights, would be a failure in a vital regard. Capital associates, and it is right and expedient that labor shall do the same. The condition of the laboring people of this country has been greatly advanced and benefited by organization, as an abundance of high authority could be quoted to show. Indeed, the history of the labor question in Europe and America establishes beyond controversy that labor organizations, based on the fundamental idea of obedience to law and scrupulous regard for the rights of others, have more than all other causes combined, elevated and improved in every way their membership and tended to bring labor and capital into harmonious and just relations.

The labor organizations of the country are in their infancy, are crude and untrained, but time will bring them the wisdom of experience and discipline, and place in the lead their most intelligent, conservative, and patriotic men, and send to the rear or expel from their ranks the rash, turbulent, and lawless, who when permitted to lead always bring about mischief and trouble. They will find out that it will not do to risk bread and meat for their families and the consequences of violated law upon the counsels of such men, but that patient forbearance, even under wrong, and obedience to law and respect for the rights of others, will bring to their support a solid public sentiment, which will join with and maintain them in demanding under the forms of law all that just and reasonable men can ask, and that the opposite course will always isolate and defeat them. Many of the capitalists of to-day were laboring men a few years ago. Many of the laboring men of to-day will be capitalists a few years hence. The great mass of the American people are laborers in some form of industry. All of them are free men, armed with the power of the ballot, and all aspire to an improved and bettered condition. The interests of the laboring men in good government are precisely those of all other good citizens.

There has never been a time and never will be, when the sympathies of the great body of the people have not been and will not be found with the laborers and producers of this country, and opposed to the rapacity and avarice of corporate power; but ours is a conservative, self-governing, and self-reliant people, who feel and know that there is no liberty without law, and that obedience to law is the fundamental idea of all government and all law and all social order, and this they will always inexorably demand as a condition of their favor and support. Organizations of laboring people for self-protection, advancement, and improvement, for securing for themselves a fair share of the profits of the enterprises they labor in, through lawful methods, will never fail to command the active sympathy and support of the people, but when used for purposes of aggression upon the rights of others, for attack instead of defense, for defiance instead of obedience to law, will not fail to excite odium and bring down swift condemnation. I yield to no man a greater abhorrence of the domination of money and corporate power than I feel. I will go as far as he who goes farthest, by every constitutional method and means in opposition to it, because I believe it, as developed and manifested in this country in its corrupting power over legislators, judges, governments, and the press, and in its power to plunder and rob the people, a standing menace to liberty and free government. But all men must recognize the inexorable necessity of adhering to the Constitution and laws in dealing with it, for lawlessness and anarchy would aggravate the evil, would invite a stronger government, further removed from the people, and still more under the dominion of that power—would bring but another turn of the screw.

No honest man can read the testimony on the files of the two Houses of Congress, taken by the various committees who have from time to time investigated the subject, without a feeling of profound indignation and disgust, that a vital necessity to the whole country, like our great railroad system, should be an instrumentality in the hands of a few individuals for the systematic robbery of all the people of the country. That it is so used is not a matter of conjecture, nor does it rest on the assertion of enemies of railroad corporations, but is shown by the testimony of some of the ablest railroad men and experts in the United States; some of whom for years have been engaged in the highest branches of railroad administration. Mr. Henry V. Poor, the author of Poor's Railroad Manual, to whose testimony before the Senate committee I have already adverted, and who will be accused by nobody of unfriendliness to railroad corporations, in his statement estimates that of the capital stock, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness, issued by the railroads of the United States, amounting at the close of 1883 to $7,495,471,311,, at least $2,000,000,000 represents what is known as "watered stock."

Mr. F. B. Thurber, of New York, a distinguished member and one of the directors of the Board of Trade and Transportation of New York city, one of the leading witnesses examined by the Senate Committee, in reply to a question propounded by Chairman CULLOM as to whether he had definite information as to the amount of "water" in railroad stock, said, on page 295 of the testimony:

No, sir; I do not think anybody has in particular. I heard Mr. Poor's estimate. I know there are so many instances where that is so very short of the mark that it is absurd. I think he said that the New York Central was about half water. Why, the New York Central had been watered three times prior to 1867-'68, and, at that time, they doubled it. They put forty-seven millions of water into the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad in 1867-'68, and they paid eight (8) per cent. dividends on that forty-seven millions until last year, which was the first year they dropped their dividends down. I think last year they paid 6 per cent., and I guess they have now got down to 4. I know I have figured up what the dividends on that water had amounted to in thirteen years, with interest compounded annually. It was $31,000,000. I think that that is a pretty good indication of where one hundred millionaires were made. That was for thirteen years on the watered stock of that road. I think I have a tabular statement of it here, if I am not mistaken. It was only carried up to 1881. In 1881 it was $75,049,000; and the next year, 1882, put it over $80,000,000.

Other witnesses examined by the committee whose testimony is embodied in the report establish upon what seems to me to be clear proof, that at least one-half of the great aggregate just given of railroad stock, bonds, &c., is "water" and nothing more, and that Mr. Poor's statement is greatly under the truth.

I referred a few minutes ago to the statement of Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Massachusetts, as to railroad values in this country as being an astonishing one. It is found on page 318 of the testimony, and is in these words: "One-fifth part of all the capital of the country, one-fifth part of all that has been saved from the hand of man and placed upon the land, consists of railway property to-day." I ask when we contemplate the accumulations of sixty millions of people in cities, towns, and country, in houses and fences, in manufactures, in horses and cattle and other live-stock, and personal property, in money and bonds, and in values of all kinds on land and water, covering a continent, and then, speaking in round numbers, the 130,000 miles of railroad in the United States, if the statement itself, assuming it to be correct as to face values, does not bear upon its face and in its body overwhelming, unanswerable, and conclusive evidence that the stock of these roads has been inflated and watered and rewatered many times over?

There are some propositions which the common mind can fathom as well as the most learned expert, and this is one of them. In the census year there were for each mile of completed railroad 23.8 square miles of area, 571 population, and 3,243 acres of improved land, and the average value of products of farms, manufactories, mines, quarries, and petroleum wells was $88,347 for each mile of road. A large proportion of the accumulations of wealth of the country is not embraced under either of the heads constituting that aggregate. Yet this product of one year of capital invested in its production is almost three times as great as the average cost of one mile of railroad, which Mr. Poor, as I will presently show, estimates at $30,000. Deducting a reasonable estimate of the value of the land actually used in the production of the aggregate of products for the census year, which is comparatively small in amount, and allowing for the enormous amount of other wealth not embraced in this calculation, it will be seen that railroad property, instead of being one-fifth part of all the accumulations of value in this country, can not be over one-half, and is most probably not a dollar over one-third, of that amount, and that the difference between this estimate and Mr. Atkinson's simply represents the "water" in the railroad stocks. Railroad building only commenced in this country about fifty years ago.

In 1830 there were only 23 miles of railroad in operation in the United States. For more than two hundred and fifty years this country has been developing, and its millions of hardy, enterprising, and thrifty people laboring and struggling and saving up wealth. It is too heavy a draught upon the credulity of the country to expect it to be believed that the comparatively few persons who have for fifty years only been building and operating railroads have honestly acquired one-fifth part of all the accumulations of value in the country. That they claim to have done so is certain. That the figures at which they value railroad property, stocks, &c., sustains that claim is equally certain. That they tax the people for transportation on a basis established for the purpose of paying interest in the shape of dividends on the amount thus claimed to be railroad values is unquestionable, and that at least one-half, and most probably a considerably larger proportion, of the alleged values is fictitious, bogus, "watered stock" does not admit of a doubt or question.

"Watered stock" means stock created by a stroke of the pen, costing nothing except the paper and ink used in making it, and representing not a penny of actual capital or value but which is added to the actual, bona fide stock which represents capital, and counted as part of the cost of the railroad, and freight and passenger rates are fixed high enough to pay dividends upon the whole, fictitious as well as real. Through this device, honest stockholders are defrauded and the people compelled to pay nearly double rates for transportation, because the corporations claim the right to fair profits or dividends on the entire stock, "watered" as well as real. This watered stock, representing nothing but the wrong which created it, stands on the books of the railroad corporations, in the stock markets, everywhere, on the same footing with stock honestly representing cash value, draws the same dividends, and commands the same prices, and the people are taxed in transportation charges to pay interest on it as if it represented full and honest cash face value.

Through this process of fraudulently watering railroad stocks a perpetual mortgage for an amount greater than the entire national debt when at its greatest figure after the war, before its reduction was commenced, has been placed upon the industry of the country, exacting from every person and every pound of freight carried its daily and hourly tribute. In order to give some idea of the methods through which stock watering is performed I here read from the testimony of Mr. Simon Sterns, representing the Board of Trade and Transportation of New York, given before the Senate committee, and found on pages 78 and 79 of the volume of testimony. He says:

The books of each railway company were a sealed mystery to all save the head of its book-keeping department. Each particular road had its own system of accounts. Indeed, it was testified before a railway committee that some $700,000 expended during one particular year by the Erie Railway as a corruption fund and for legal expenses was carried to the india-rubber account, and thus found its way into the construction account. So that part of the construction account of some of these railways is what they expend annually upon legislative committees, or in influencing or preventing legislation, and in the law courts.

The New York Central Railway Company in 1869 doubled its stock, watered its stock by 50 per cent. on the amalgamation or consolidation of the New York Central and Hudson River roads, issuing $2 for one of the entire stock of these several companies. They had, therefore, after this consolidation, a stock account which was out of all harmony with their construction account, and for ten years following, every year varying, from 3 to 8 per cent. of this water was artificially carried into the construction account, so that eventually the construction account and the capital account balanced; and there is therefore a construction account wholly fictitious as to a trifle of $40,000,000 or thereabouts in the New York Central books. As a system of book-keeping it had to balance, and therefore the balance was forced by carrying some years 3, some 5, and some 8 per cent. of this water into the construction account, as though so much construction had been carried on that year, and eventually the two accounts balanced. In the same way the balances were forced in the Erie Railway Company when Mr. Gould took $40,000,000 of the stock of the Erie Railway Company out of its books, sold it on the street, and appropriated the money to his own use, and there was not a dollar's worth of construction to represent it, and when a reorganization took place the balance of the Erie Railway Company was forced to meet that violence done to the stock account. So that in some of these railway corporations their system of keeping accounts is a mystery to everybody outside of the corporation.

Again, Mr. F. B. Thurber, of New York, on pages 274 and 275 of the volume of testimony, illustrates the operation of stock watering by a tabulated statement of figures showing that the dividends on $47,000,000 of watered stock put into the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, the same referred to by Mr. Sterne, with interest thereon from 1869 to 1884, both inclusive, amounted to $100,000,000. He concludes on this point by saying that if this stock which had previously been largely watered had not again been watered "the public would have been $100,000,000 richer and Mr. Vanderbilt and his associates $100,000,000 poorer." "Overcapitalization" is the polite designation for this method of plundering the people.

The same gentleman in his testimony said: "Excessive capitalization operates as a mortgage upon the industry of the country whenever the power exists to impose rates for transportation which will yield dividends on watered stock." The power to impose rates exists universally with the corporations, except in the rare cases when competition controls them. Pooling, which is now the order of the day among railroads, and is utterly destructive of competition, gives to railroad corporations power to exact full dividends upon their fictitious watered stock. It has become an axiom in railroad administration that when combinations is possible competition is impossible.

Says Mr. Thurber on page 274 of testimony taken by the committee:

In considering the subject, "what is a reasonable rate," we are constantly brought face to face with perhaps the greatest difficulty and one of the greatest wrongs connected with the whole subject, namely, fictitious capitalization. Professional promoters have overloaded our railway system with watered stock, and have imposed upon the practical railway men of this country, who operate these great highways, the impossible task of earning dividends upon this mass of fictitious capital, and at the same time satisfying the public. Having thus overcapitalized our transportation system, they endeavored by combination to enforce rates which would yield dividends upon the entire mass of capital.

The testimony of Mr. Poor, Mr. Stern, Mr. Atkinson, Mr. O'Donnell, and all of the ablest and best informed men who came before the committee, concurred that railroad property, on the basis of the actual honest capital in it, pays better even in the hardest times than any other investment in the United States, and that all the trouble about it comes from forcing dividends on watered stock. From the beginning of time, the effort to get something for nothing has produced trouble, and always will. Discussing this subject, Mr. Poor says, in his manual for 1884:

The increase of share capital and indebtedness of all the companies for three years ending December 31, 1883, was $2,093,433,054, the cost of the new mileage, as represented by share capital and debt, being about $70,000 per mile. The increase in the three years of the funded debts of all the companies was $924,-165,440; of their floating debts, $169,880,406; of the two, $1,094,045,846. It is not probable that the cost of the mileage constructed in the three years equaled the increase of funded and floating debts by at least the sum of $200,000,000. The cost of mileage constructed certainly did not exceed $30,000 to the mile. The whole increase of the share capital, $999,387,208, and a portion of the funded debt, was in excess of cost of construction. If it be assumed that the cost in money of all the roads in operation in the United States in 1883 did not exceed, as it certainly did not, the amount of their funded and floating debts, $3,787,-410,728, the actual investment was a most profitable one. The net earnings for the year were $336,911,884, a sum equaling 9 per cent. on their cost. If the fictitious capital could be eliminated from their accounts, their success as investments would have no parallel.

This statement from Mr. Poor, than whom the railroad corporations have no abler or better friend, that for the three years ending December 31, 1883, the new railroad constructed was stocked and bonded for $70,000 per mile, when the actual cost of construction was only $30,000 per mile, showing $40,000 per mile of "watered stock," and that in as hard a year as 1883 the actual capital invested in railroads paid 9 per cent. net profit, fully justifies the conclusion of his statement that—

If the fictitious capital could be eliminated from their accounts, their success as investments would have no parallel.

Mr. Poor again says, on page 229:

The introduction of water into the share-capital of railroads, from the enormous amount issued, is the chief cause of the condition of things of which so much complaint has been made, and which was the occasion for the appointment of your committee. After "water" is issued the next thing is to make it valuable by the imposition of exorbitant charges upon traffic passing over the roads issuing it. There have never been wanting earnest protests against this great wrong, all to very little or no effect.

To give value to "watered stock" means in plain English to rob the public in extortionate transportation charges, and the employés who perform the labor on the railroad lines in reduced wages. Labor can not duplicate itself to meet this duplication of capital, nor can the public protect itself against the wrongful and dishonest exaction.

It is the watered stock which brings down the per cent. of profit on railroad investments and forces them into bankruptcy, and the proceeds of this fictitious stock, the issuance of which is covered up in the intricacies of a system of book-keeping understood only by the few who keep the books, find their way into the pockets of the few high in authority in the corporations, who, in violation of official trust, defraud honest stockholders and plunder the public in amassing princely fortunes for themselves. It is to give value to this fraudulently-issued stock and buoy it on Wall street, that dividends on it are forced by double charges on the public for transportation, and by cutting down the wages of labor. In order to keep up the value of stock the charges must be sufficient to pay interest on the bonds outstanding, because that must be paid first, and then to pay the dividends on the stock, so that the stock and bonds constitute the basis for transportation charges.

Mr. Joseph, of Iowa, a witness before the committee, stated that the aggregate of the bonded debt and stock of the railroads of Iowa amounted last year, according to official reports, to $258,000,000, while the property of the roads upon which they paid taxes was assessed at only $30,000,000, and that the annual net profit of the roads was within a fraction of 5 per cent. on the first-named amount, or about $12,000,000, which is exactly 40 per cent. net profit on the amount they assess for taxes; and it will be remembered that this profit was made during a period of unparalleled depression. I read from the testimony, page 1036:

Senator HARRIS. Did I understand you correctly when I understood you to say that the stock and bonded debt amounted to $258,000,000 on your railroads?

Mr. JOSEPH. Yes, sir.

Senator HARRIS. And that the assessment for taxation was $30,000,000 in the aggregate?

Mr. JOSEPH. Yes, sir.

Senator HARRIS. A difference of $228,000,000?

Mr. JOSEPH. The assessment is about one-ninth of the sum on which they draw revenues.

The assessment for taxes to the State about one-ninth of the sum on which their rates and charges are fixed and on which they draw revenues. This statement as to the Iowa roads is believed to be equally true as to the proportion of "water" in railroad stocks throughout the Southwest.

I could multiply quotations to the same effect indefinitely from the mass of testimony before the Senate, but will not consume more time to do so. It is sufficient to say that all the testimony concurs in attributing to overcapitalization, or, in other words, to fraudulently issued stock and bonds known as "watered stock," all the difficulties surrounding railroad administration, producing, as it does, a war between the people and the railroad corporations, the former trying to protect themselves from extortionate rates sought to be enforced by the latter for the purpose of making dividends on fictitious capital, or, to speak more accurately, on no capital at all.

The mystery as to the mode of accumulating the colossal fortunes which in the last fifteen years have been amassed by leading railroad men is solved under the light of the undisputed facts, which show wholesale pillage of the public in the administration of the great transportation business of the country. These great railroad lines are as necessary to the civilization and commercial, social, and political life of the Republic as blood circulation is to the life of man, and disease, impurity, and taint in the latter is no more fatal to physical health than corruption and dishonesty in the management of the former is to the health of the body-politic. The duty of the government, State and national, is plain. Congress should no longer permit corporations in their own interest to regulate interstate commerce as they now do, to usurp a function vested by the Constitution in Congress, but should itself by law regulate it in the interest of the public in a mode which shall be fair to honestly invested capital. But the chief responsibility and the highest duty rest with the States which have chartered the great railroad corporations. These owe it to themselves, to their people, to the great right of local self-government which needs to be vindicated in this regard, to take hold of this subject in earnest and deal with it as its stupendous importance demands. The power is in their hands to apply the remedy. I read from page 52 of the testimony taken by the Senate committee, from the statement of Mr. John O'Donnell, a member of the board of railroad commissioners of the State of New York. He says:

The prejudice against railroads will be dissipated when railroads are honest or are made to be honest by basing their earning upon honest capital.

Senator PLATT. Suppose the stock of a railroad or any other corporation falls to a point where it correctly represents the cost—you say that some of these elevated roads have a capital largely in excess of their cost—suppose the stock of such a railroad should fall to a point that actually represented its cost or value, is there any way you know of that the State can oblige the company to reorganize on that basis?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Probably not; but the State can limit their earnings so that it is a practical reorganization on a basis of honest capital. They can reduce the rates of fare and freight.

Senator PLATT. Do you think it ought to be done?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Certainly. I think railroads should only be permitted to earn a fair dividend on honest capital.

I read again from the testimony of the same gentleman, on pages 48 and 49:

Senator PLATT. The ownership of the roads has passed largely out of the hands of the men who watered the stock. Does that fact make any difference in your mind as to the amount of earnings they should be allowed?

Mr. O'DONNELL. You have raised a difficult question, and one that, as a just man, I have considered very much. Where a State, by legislative action, has legalized watered stock, it can not afford to repudiate it. Where there has been no legislative action I know of no rule of law or ethics which makes an investor in railroad stocks stand differently from an investor in any other stock. I think the sooner the idea that no matter where a road is built, or for what purpose, when its stock or bonds are put on the market somehow they are guaranteed against loss, is dissipated the better for all concerned. The commerce of the country must not be burdened to pay large dividends on watered railroad stocks, it being inimical to the prosperity of the commonwealth.

Senator PLATT. You think this question of watering is so well known that persons who buy railroad stock buy it with knowledge?

Senator HARRIS. With such knowledge as to put them on inquiry?

Mr. O'DONNELL. The courts have decided that a man buying stock must buy with his eyes open, and this is the way the public buy all other securities.

I read from page 39 of the testimony, part of the statement of Mr. Rogers, also one of the board of railroad commissioners of the State of New York:

Senator PLATT. You think it is a matter a commission could deal with to determine whether, in a particular case where complaint was made, a railroad was charging too much?

Mr. ROGERS. Where complaint is made that too much is being charged from a particular point the method in which our commission deals with it is this: We take up the question of the cost of the construction of the road, we find out how much it has taken to build it, how much stock and how many bonds are out, and how much has gone in good faith into the construction of the road. We then take their revenues and see whether those revenues are paying a fair rate, after the cost of hauling and handling are taken out, upon the cost of construction. If so, we reach the conclusion that the general rates upon that road ought not to be diminished under the guarantee of the general railroad act.

* * * * * * *

Senator PLATT. In dealing with this question do you call the "cost of construction" what the company represents the cost of construction to be, or do you try to get at what the road was actually constructed for?

Mr. ROGERS. We get at what it actually was constructed for. Of course we can not go into the question as to whether they paid more for their iron or their ties than they really ought to have paid, but we do substantially get at the question what amount of money went in, and take out the "water."

Senator PLATT. Suppose the company, in building the road, let the contract to a construction company in which parties interested in the building of the road were also interested, and made a very large and unconscionable profit out of that contract, do you consider that at all?

Mr. ROGERS. That specific question has not been brought before us, although I can see that it would be very embarrassing. Not having been brought before us I can not answer it, but a number of cases have been brought before us where we were obliged to find out the cost of construction, and we did it substantially. The elevated roads was a case in point. They are stocked and bonded for $45,000,000. We found their actual cost of construction was $22,680,000, and Commissioner O'Donnell found in his minority report that it was $22,250,000.

I read again from page 301 of the same volume of testimony, from the statement of Judge Thomas Russell, chairman of the railroad commission of the State of Massachusetts. He says:

Furthermore, our supreme court has always held very strictly the doctrine that railroad corporations are public corporations, created solely for the good of the public, and that they are to be dealt with accordingly. A great many years ago Mr Choate said to the Legislature: "Railroads are made for the people, and not the people for railroads;" and that idea has been adopted by the supreme court of this State. The doctrine that a railroad corporation is a public corporation, existing solely for the benefit of the people, and not of the stockholders, has been stated by Chief-Justice Shaw and Justice Gray, who was lately our chief-justice, as strongly and as clearly as ever any Granger asked to have it stated.

I now read from the report of the board of railroad commissioners of the State of New York to the Legislature of that State. They say:

A common carrier thus created becomes at common law a quasi public servant, bound, as the price of its privileges conferred, to carry all persons and property offered to it for a just and reasonable compensation, and with due regard to public safety and convenience. It is the right and duty of the State, either in the original charter or by subsequent legislative or other action, to see that the citizen has service to which he is thus entitled, to prevent railroads from assuming rights and privileges not granted, to compel the correction of abuses, and to require the performance of duties assumed. No less has the railroad at least a well-recognized, equitable right to insist that the State shall guard its property, that it shall be protected in the exercise of its chartered privileges, and that subsequent legislation shall not exceed the limits above stated.

This position toward its citizens and toward its railroads the State ever and unceasingly occupies. For instance, the right conferred to impose and collect fares and freight rates is the permission of the State to exact from transportation and commerce a tax in return for a public service required of and performed by the railroad. The amount of this tax in a just and equitable view and based on a public policy which duly regards good faith, and which is liberal enough to promote and sustain prompt, eficient, and constantly improving service on the part of railroads is that amount which will pay expenses and a fair return upon the capital of the corporation invested. To keep the tax within this limit is the duty of the State toward its citizens; to sustain it at this point is the corporation's right, in the enforcement of which the State ought not to interfere.

The States are under the highest obligation to protect and deal liberally with the actual honest capital invested in railroads. This is due to the corporations, their stockholders and creditors, no less than to the public honor and credit, but the obligation is equally binding and sacred to protect the public against the extortion and imposition practiced by the corporations through the instrumentality of fraudulently issued stock and bonds. There is not a railroad company in the United States except one who se stock has not been repeatedly watered and rewatered, and that is not taxing the people nearly or quite double on transportation to pay interest and dividends on bogus, fictitious capital. The Baltimore and Ohio is named by Mr. Thurber as an exception. That corporation, he says, has never watered its stock, and he attributes its great prosperity to that fact. There is not a railroad corporation in the United States whose stock which represents actual capital honestly expended in construction and equipment, would not pay heavy dividends and be a magnificent investment.

These conclusions are overwhelmingly established in all the testimony on the records of the Senate and House, and there is no dissent from the opinion that nine-tenths of the rate wars and other troubles between the railroad corporations themselves, and between them and the public grow out of "watered stock." This being the great disturbing cause should be eliminated by the State governments, whose charters confer on these corporations the right to exist. It makes no difference how this is done, whether through a commission with power to adjust the rates of freight and passage on the basis of the actual capital invested, discarding "watered stock" from the estimate, or in some other mode which is just and equitable, so it is done. The evil will never correct itself, but if not dug up by the roots will grow from bad to worse. Whenever a corporation is driven through the instrumentality of "watered stock" into bankruptcy and the hands of a receiver, and is settled up and its property sold out, the first thing done by the purchaser on reorganization is to water the stock again, and thus the process goes on, and the grip on the throat of the public is maintained without interruption.

This crime against the public will never cease until the people through their State governments, which alone can deal with it, shall make war upon it with earnestness, energy, and determination. Now that the attention of the country is attracted by recent disturbances to the general subject of railroad transportation in connection with the labor troubles, and the public mind is busy with the problem, it would be well while devising means to assure with absolute certainty the perfect freedom of commerce from embarrassment, obstruction, or hindrance, by protecting railroad property from injury and railroad employés from violence and intimidation, which should be done, if necessary, with the whole power of the respective States, also to consider and adopt the surest and best means of eradicating and wiping out that greatest of all evils affecting our railroad system, the prolific parent of all the evils which beset it, "watered stock," bogus, fictitious capital, and of placing the railroad system of the country upon the honest basis of the actual capital invested in construction and equipment.

Common justice and the public interest alike require that while the whole power of the state shall guard and protect railroad property and franchises and employés against invasion, injury, or molestation from any quarter, that it shall also protect the people against extortion and oppression by the railroad corporations. The honor of our Government, State and national, is solemnly pledged to the protection of honest capital actually invested in railroad enterprises, in the enjoyment of fair and even liberal returns, but is pledged with equal sacredness to protect the people against the fraud and rapacity of the corporations, and oppressive and wrongful exactions upon their commerce.

When laying its hands upon the laborer, who, under the exasperating influence of evil counsels and real or imaginary wrongs, violates its mandates, the law must not shrink from a contest with the corporations of its own creation, which coolly and systematically use their powers to wrong and defraud the whole people. To command respect and obedience the law must act equally and alike upon all, upon the strong as well as the weak, the rich as well as the poor.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a speech on this subject; but, inasmuch as the Senator from Texas has called up this bill and has advocated it in a very able speech, principally devoted to the watered stock of railroads, of which I have nothing to say, I desire to call his attention to some points, inasmuch as he is an advocate of this bill, without committing myself either for or against it if I can do no better.

First, it proposes an arbitration. When? After commerce has been interfered with, and not before. That is objectionable in my mind.

Second, after you arbitrate you do not agree in the bill that the arbitration shall be enforced. You provide that the trouble shall be arbitrated, but provide no means by which either party shall have power to enforce the judgment of the arbitrators. That is all there is of the bill. The rest of it is mere machinery.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me I will state——

Mr. BLAIR. I hope Senators will not allow this to pass into a miscellaneous debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Illinois wished to make a remark.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senate to give me ten minutes.

Mr. BLAIR. I should object to its leading to a discussion between Senators.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not going to have a discussion. I did not get up to make a speech, but I rose for the purpose of saying that this bill, as reported by the Committee on Education and Labor, has three propositions in it: First, to arbitrate after commerce has been stopped——

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Illinois will permit me to say that I think he is very clearly mistaken about that.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, what is it?

Mr. COKE. I have sent for a copy of the bill; I have not one before me just now.

Mr. LOGAN. I have it. It reads:

> Which differences or controversies may hinder, impede, obstruct, interrupt, or affect such transportation of property or passengers.

Then they shall do what? Then they shall, on the application of both sides, arbitrate. That is, after the impeding has been done, then they shall arbitrate.

I propose that they shall arbitrate before, that if a difference occurs they shall arbitrate before commerce is interfered with.

But I have framed a substitute for the amendment of the President of the Senate and for this bill, which I propose to offer at the proper time. I concluded, inasmuch as the Senator from Texas had taken some time in discussing the bill, to state briefly what my proposition is. I have only the framework of it; I was just completing it when the Senator rose to speak; and for that reason I desire to state exactly what I shall propose when I get my scheme completed.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Have it printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I will when it is completed. I am not going to offer it now, but I will state what I propose to offer as a substitute.

First, I propose that a commission to be called the commission of arbitration shall be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate; that they shall be selected from men who understand the industries of the country, the labor question, and those questions which have caused the trouble between employers and employés; that they shall not be partisans, but one shall be selected from one party and another from another and another from persons claiming no party organization, another one selected from the class of persons who are well versed in transportation, and the other one selected from the class of persons known as the laboring classes of this country, so that all classes shall be represented, the commission being five in number, and have a secretary, a stenographer, and a messenger. These members shall as soon as appointed and confirmed meet and organize and elect one of their number as president of the board. That is the first proposition. They are to hold their term of office for three years, and receive an annual compensation of $3,500, the secretary $2,000, the stenographer $2,000, and the messenger $1,400.

Their duties then shall be to examine into all cases where differences exist between employer and employé engaged in the transportation of persons or property, and to make a report through the President of the United States to the Congress of the United States. Where the parties, as the House bill provides, agree to an arbitration, they shall submit their agreement in writing. In other words, they and their attorneys shall agree in writing that these commissioners shall arbitrate the question. Then the commissioners shall have power to send for persons and papers, to swear witnesses and examine the whole case in a summary way and decide the question on principles of equity pertaining to the controversy. When a decision is made, that decision shall be filed in the district court of the United States for the district in which the controversy occurred. When that award is filed between the parties before the district court, it is to be spread on the record and become a decree of the court, to be enforced as other decrees of the court.

I propose to substitute that for this bill for the reason that there is no way provided in this bill for enforcing the decree. Under the House bill you may arbitrate to-day, and to-morrow if I am a party I may say, "I do not care for your arbitration; you have no power to provide for its enforcement; you make no provision for its enforcement;" it is a mere act of the parties after some trouble has arisen, and the whole thing vanishes if either side disagrees to it.

My proposition declares that the parties are all to be heard by themselves on their own oath if they desire and by witnesses and may be represented by attorneys if they wish. Further than that, I make it the duty of the commission to investigate all controversies arising as the one did arise which perhaps caused the introduction of this bill. I provide whether these persons refer the question to the commission or not, whether they agree to arbitrate before the commission or not, that it shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the controversy and report the facts so that the President shall refer them to Congress, that Congress may have some means of judging and knowing hereafter as to the manner of dealing with this question.

Then I provide for the mode of summoning witnesses, for the pay of witnesses and officers serving process, and give authority to the commissioners to send for persons and papers and have officers to execute subpœnas and bring witnesses before them, having the powers that a commission should have for the purpose of making proper examinations.

I provide also that the expense of an arbitration shall be paid by the Government of the United States where it does not exceed a certain amount; that witnesses and marshals shall be paid fees according to the fees now allowed by law to witnesses and persons serving process.

I go further. I provide that the act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Labor," approved June 27, 1884, is hereby amended so that the bureau shall hereafter be designated and known as the Department of Labor, and that the Commissioner, in addition to the duties now required of him by law, shall be required to communicate with the various railroad companies and other corporations and associations of individuals engaged in the transportation of persons or property, or engaged in any other of the industries of the country where they are carried on by a corporation or an association, and shall ascertain the number of employés in each instance as far as practicable and the manner in which their labor is conducted and the character of the labor performed, and also as near as may be the condition, situation, manner of living, facilities for the education of the children of the laborers so employed, the relations of labor to capital generally, and also make comparative lists and statements as to the number of hours of labor required in the various employments, and also ascertain the character of the labor and compensation in the various European countries, make up the statistics, make comparative statements of labor, the price of food, the price of living, and make report to the Secretary of the Interior and through him to the Congress of the United States for the purpose of ascertaining properly all connected with labor and employments in this and other countries, so that we may legislate hereafter, if necessary, in a manner that will be calculated to bring proper results.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that one of his objections to the House bill was that it did not operate until after a disturbance had occurred? I desire to read a clause of the bill to show him that he is mistaken in that regard. The first section provides—

> That whenever differences or controversies arise between railroad companies engaged in the transportation of property or passengers between two or more States of the United States, between a Territory and State, within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia, and the employés of said railroad companies, which differences or controversies may hinder, impede, obstruct, interrupt, or affect such transportation of property or passengers——

Mr. LOGAN. Then they shall investigate.

Mr. COKE. I read this simply to answer the Senator's objection that the bill did not operate until after the obstruction had occurred.

Mr. LOGAN. We will not discuss it now. That affects investigation. What I said was that the provision of the bill was that where transportation was impeded they might arbitrate. The Senator now refers to another matter.

What I wish to say is that as soon as I correct one or two provisions in this proposition, that I have been preparing last night and this morning, I shall offer it as a substitute for the bill and amendments, and I will try to be prepared as well as I can when it comes up to advocate the proposition.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service, who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment proposed by Mr. VAN WYCK is at the end of section 1 to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That no soldier under this act shall receive less than $8 per month.

To which Mr. BLAIR proposes as an amendment to strike out all after the words "Provided further" and insert:

That no pension paid under any law to any soldier hereafter shall be rated at less than $4 per month.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It seems to me from the discussion which has taken place on this bill that it comes before the Senate in a very loose form. There appears to be a great desire for information and a want of information which no member of the committee seems to be able to give. It is a very important subject, and the measure, if enacted, will necessarily take a large sum of money from the public Treasury.

In order that the Senate may be thoroughly advised as to the result, the actual or approximate result, of its action if the bill should be passed and become a law, I desire for my part to have such information as will enable me to act intelligently on the subject. I therefore move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions with instructions to investigate and report to the Senate the approximate amount of money which will be needed from the Treasury to carry into effect the provisions of the bill, so that the Senate may have full knowledge of all matters connected with the bill, the amount of money needed, and that provision may be made in some way to raise the needed amount of money to carry out our pledges to the pensioners.

I think the chairman of the committee and the Committee on Pensions generally should agree to such a proposition at once. The delay need not be very long. The Pension Department will be able to give something like an approximate estimate, taking into consideration the number of persons who will probably call for relief under this bill, and it need not perhaps delay action on the bill more than a week or ten days, or perhaps even less. Certainly the Committee on Pensions should come to the Senate prepared to give us some information touching this subject. If the committee are unwilling to take that responsibility upon themselves, certainly the committee ought to give some Senator upon the floor the opportunity of making the investigation. I would even attempt to do it myself at the sacrifice of any and every other duty I may have here rather than be called upon to vote for a bill which I can not tell one of my constituents what its effect will be upon the tax-payers of the country.

While I sympathize somewhat with the bill, I submit that this is a piece of the blindest legislation with respect to the cost and the consequences to the tax-payer that has ever been brought to the attention of the Senate since I have been a member of the body.

While I do not wish it to be understood in making this motion that I am attacking the bill itself, at the same time I think it must be apparent to the mind of every Senator that we should pause and see where we are going before proceeding any further in this direction.

Mr. President, I now offer my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to recommit the bill with instructions, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The motion is:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, with instructions to investigate and report to the Senate the approximate amount of money which will be needed from the Treasury to carry into effect the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. One word more. There are several amendments pending in the Senate which tend in the direction of increasing the committee's bill and others in the direction of decreasing it. If an approximate estimate, which would be sufficient for all the practical purposes of legislation, could be given on the basis of the committee's bill, it would enable each Senator to form something like a correct estimate touching the effect of the amendments which propose to either increase or decrease the amount granted by the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey is so kind and good, so anxious to be right on this matter, that I felt almost entranced into acquiescence in his motion. He is so "child-like and bland" in his manner that I was nearly persuaded, until about the last of his remarks, that he was really for the bill and was in the honest and anxious pursuit of information. But I am compelled to remind the Senator that this is a bill on which he has already once voted in a former Congress, that here is no new proposition, he is perfectly familiar with it, he has acted upon it once; he is not a new member of the Senate who is entirely ignorant of the contents of the bill and the data on which it is based.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Did we have the information in the former Congress that is asked for now?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator had such information that he did not feel the necessity of calling for more. He was able to vote and did vote, at least I have no doubt that he did, and probably against the bill, as now he will again under any circumstances whatever. This proposition was discussed more or less, the idea itself, in the Forty-seventh Congress, if I recollect aright. It was pending in the Forty-eighth Congress during both sessions. It was finally discussed at very considerable length in the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress, and this precise proposition was voted upon.

Application was made to the Pension Department for information touching upon the probable cost of this bill if it should become a law; and upon the propositions contained in the bill the Commissioner replied, as he very naturally might, as anybody must, that it was impossible for him to estimate any better than anybody else could as to the probable cost of the bill if it should become a law. We know, and he gave to us, about the number of surviving soldiers in the country, but how many of those surviving soldiers are now disabled it is impossible for him or for anybody else to tell. How many of them are both disabled and poor, so that they would be brought within the provisions of the bill, it is quite as difficult to determine. But we do know that it is the duty of a man to pay his debts, and that that duty is not affected by the question of amount.

As I stated yesterday, the bill contains a general proposition upon which a man must vote as his conscience shall dictate rather than anything else. If it is right that these men, to be provided for by somebody, should be provided for by sixty million people instead of by their comparatively few associates in the communities in which they live, the sixty million having received the benefit of their sacrifices and services in the field, the bill ought to become law. If not, the bill should be rejected. That is the general rule by which I guide my own opinions and my own action in regard to the support of the bill.

As to the actual amount that the bill will cost, I have stated on several occasions as closely as I could my own conjecture, if you please. I think it will cost somewhere from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 as the bill stands—probably $25,000,000. The Senator from Illinois says he does not think it will cost that amount. I do not know of anybody who estimates the amount to be more than I have done.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that the annual or the gross sum?

Mr. BLAIR. The annual sum.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I find by a reference to the RECORD that the Senator from New Hampshire on another occasion concluded that it would cost $50,000,000.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is quite mistaken about that. We have been over that three times in the present debate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does the Senator know that it would not cost $50,000,000, or $100,000,000, or $150,000,000? I am supposing, as we must necessarily suppose, that as a pensioner becomes old and in a measure decrepit his pension would be increased. As you provide in your bill for total-disability pensions of $24 a month, would it not be reasonable to suppose that the majority of the pensioners at this time, twenty-odd years after the war has closed, twenty-five years after it was begun, would be total-disability pensioners? Therefore how can the Senator, from any data in his possession, give us anything like an approximate idea of the cost of the bill?

Mr. BLAIR. I will answer that by asking the Senator—

Mr. MCPHERSON. One word more. If it were submitted to the Pension Department, where these ratings have been made, a judgment could be formed from the pensioners of the present time, from the number of those who are total-disability pensioners and those of smaller ratings, which would give us something of a more accurate knowledge than the Senator seems able to give, or than, if able, he is willing to give.

Mr. BLAIR. We made that call in the last Congress; we submitted it to the Pension Department, and obtained the reply which I have stated. I ask the Senator whether, with the knowledge which he exhibits of the elements of the problem, he believes it is possible for a man who happens to be clothed with the position of Commissioner of Pensions to answer such questions any better than we can?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to have an answer to my question on that subject.

Mr. BLAIR. We have all the data, we have the ratings; we have the number of pensioners that there are now; we have the number of soldiers who are probably surviving in the country; we have possession of all the facts he can give us; and we have been accustomed to assume that we had as much of the necessary common sense to consider the data when furnished to us as anybody, and that we are as capable of forming an opinion.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to say in this connection, if the Senator will bear with me, that I think if that inquiry were made of the Senator from New Hampshire or myself, as Commissioner of Pensions, we should respond to it. I take it that the present Commissioner will with equal alacrity respond to any call made on him for information. Certainly he has done so in the past; and if it took every clerk in the Pension Department to make estimates and to give facts and figures I believe he would employ them for that purpose. It would surely do no harm to the Senate to be in possession of all the information touching this matter which could possibly be given.

Mr. BLAIR. The investigations of the Commissioner of Pensions and his clerks are not among the class of soldiers who are covered by the bill, and the Commissioner is not likely to be in the possession of any data which would enable him to throw light in the form of an opinion upon the probable cost of this bill any further than he has already done so by giving us the data which we have in his report, and the statistics which are open and common to us all.

In regard to the actual expense, the immediate expense, should the bill become a law, it must not be considered, because perhaps a quarter of a million may under its provisions come to represent the average addition from year to year to the pension-roll, that the immediate cost for the present year would be any such amount. If there should be an increase to that number, and if it should average from year to year that number until the soldiers disappeared, or at least until the roll commenced to diminish by reason of their disappearance from the earth, the probable cost would be from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000, as I have often stated, so far as my own judgment is concerned. But nothing would be paid under this measure until the claims were investigated and established, and that is a process requiring time. It is not probable that the next fiscal year would witness an increase of the expenditures of the Pension Office to any great extent, because six months or a year would undoubtedly be required in the investigation and establishment of the claims to any considerable number at least.

With a million survivors, which is the estimate I believe all around in the country, a quarter of them already on the pension-roll, a great many of them still in the full vigor of life, a great many more who are not in the full vigor of life, but who nevertheless have the means of comfortable support, neither class coming under the provisions of this bill, I do not believe that there can remain more than another quarter of a million who would be covered by its provisions by reason of their being both poor and dependent upon their labor for support and disabled for the performance of that labor. If that be so, taking the tables which the Commissioner furnishes us, the expense under the bill could not be more than $20,000,000 or $25,000,000. At the same time, it is like guessing how many people will die next year, and it is of course utterly impossible to furnish any warrant beforehand of the exact amount of the expenditure.

But, as I said in the first place, if this money ought to be paid, if these people ought to be taken care of, and they have got to be taken care of, and will be taken care of, for there must be the endurance of starvation and want on their part or they must be taken care of by the nation at large or by their neighbors, generally poor, or by their comrades, generally poorer still, or by the ordinary pauper systems of the counties and the States—if that is true, then I think the question is one which the Senate can decide in but one way, whether the parties whom I have mentioned should bear the burden or the nation itself at large.

I received a paper this morning from Pennsylvania. Of course I do not know whether its statement is true or not, but I have no reason to doubt it. It is a newspaper containing the statement that in that single county where it is published there were seventy-five old soldiers of the war for the Union who were supported in the pauper-houses of the county by public charity. Facts of that kind, as we all know, exist in all parts of the country where these soldiers live, and such facts are a national disgrace.

If I felt that the committee could give the Senate any further or more reliable information by a continued investigation, which has now been prolonged for some three or four years, I would not object to the bill going back to the committee. I would not object if I thought a recommittal could be of any service to the committee or the Senate or the country in the elucidation of further data. Still, feeling it not to be possible that we could give more information to the Senate and feeling that this disgrace should not longer exist, I must oppose the Senator's motion, and I hope that the Senate will proceed to consider and dispose of the bill in some way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the bill be recommitted with instructions.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that if we refer the bill to the committee they can give us a very great deal of information. Although I confess myself that the bill in the shape in which it comes from the committee has no careful estimate of what it would cost, and is not entirely satisfactory to me, I think the friends of the bill, of whom I consider myself one, ought in some way to attempt to show about what will be the whole cost.

The first section of the bill practically, as I understand it, puts every survivor of the Union armies on the pension-roll who is disabled and dependent upon his own labor for support. There are 149,000 applications pending before the Department of persons who we may presume will be considered dependent under the bill. There were in June, 1885, 149,000 applications for invalid pensions that had been rejected, and rejected I suppose almost entirely because the parties failed to prove that their disability was incurred in the line of duty. I think very few cases will be found where the parties have applied for a pension that they will not be able to show that they were disabled, and the great question to be determined was whether they were disabled in the line of duty or out of the line, or subsequent to their discharge from the Army. Those persons, it may be presumed, would make their applications under the pending bill.

We add to that large body of men a very uncertain number. Every man who has been disabled since the war and has to depend upon his own exertions would be entitled under the bill to make his application. Out of the one hundred and forty-nine thousand cases it is fair to presume that at least much more than one hundred thousand will be able to put themselves on the roll under that provision. Then there will be a very large number of men who are not on the roll, who are not applicants, who are not now in the Pension Office seeking to be put on the roll. Then we add the dependent fathers and mothers, which is an uncertain quantity, and it is impossible for anybody to determine the number.

So far as I am concerned, I am exceedingly anxious, wherever there is a disabled soldier who is disabled from earning his living in an honest way, to provide for his support. I am also exceedingly anxious that the class of men who will sometimes seek to put themselves on the roll who are not so dependent or not so disabled shall be kept off. I suppose the machinery of the Department is sufficient to keep that class of people off.

I think if the bill had come here with a provision for a fixed sum for those who are found to be disabled, it would be more satisfactory than it is now. If the committee are of the opinion that they can not give us any data to go upon, then it is not worth while to rerefer the bill to the committee.

What it would cost is a mere conjecture. The honorable Senator who has the bill in charge says it will cost probably not less than $25,000,000 per annum, a mere nothing in the way we consider amounts in these days. I do not want the bill to pass with the understanding that it is a very small sum that we are to pay. In my judgment $25,000,000 will not begin to cover it. Three hundred and forty-five thousand one hundred and twenty-five pensioners now on the roll require $65,000,000 per annum.

Mr. BLAIR. Thirty-eight million dollars is the annual charge. Sixty-five million dollars was the total last year. That includes the aggregation of the first payments.

Mr. TELLER. It represents the aggregation of the first payment.

Mr. BLAIR. Thirty-eight million dollars is the cost from year to year.

Mr. TELLER. So after deducting those we might take the $38,000,000. Now if you add one hundred thousand more names to the roll you have added nearly a third more in amount. Then you have all the dependent fathers and all the dependent mothers to be added, of which, as I said before, the number is entirely uncertain. Nobody will be able to say whether it is ten thousand or fifty thousand.

I notice whenever these bills come before the Senate that they always come here with an estimate exceedingly small, and they have always been underestimated. While, as I said before, I am in favor of paying to every disabled dependent soldier a bounty from the Government, I am in favor of doing it with our eyes open; and I am not in favor of pushing such a bill through here or anywhere else and deceiving ourselves that it is going to cost a mere nothing.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think I understood the Senator to say that he saw no particular advantage to be gained by recommitting the bill to the committee if the committee could give no further information. Let me say to the Senator that I observed yesterday in the discussion that the committee itself did not agree as to what plan should be adopted, whether there should be an indefinite sum or a fixed sum paid, and certainly the committee would be able to come to some conclusion touching that subject. I noticed that some members of the committee were in favor of fixing a sum of $8 a month to cover all cases of disability. There are a great many things it seems to me that the committee might be able to agree upon.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to say a word on that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Colorado was yielding to me.

Mr. TELLER. I was coming to the very point to which the Senator from New Jersey calls attention.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say that the committee at the regular meeting this morning failed to agree on those points. The committee is unable to agree, and it would be entirely useless to send the bill back for the determination of questions which in the end must be submitted to the Senate, and which have been already pretty thoroughly discussed in the presence of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I was about to allude to the fact that yesterday there seemed to be a diversity of opinion among the members of the committee. Some members of the committee thought that $8 should be the limit. The bill confines it to $24. Other members of the committee thought that the lowest sum to be paid, whatever might be the disability, should be $4, and some thought that $8 should be the lowest sum. I think the committee should have brought in a definite bill, or if the bill comes here with the committee divided, I think the committee should let the bill alone and we should pass the bill as it now stands, which is a good deal better than to tinker with it by determining whether the lowest rate shall be $4, or $8, or whether the highest rate shall be $8. Twenty-four dollars is fixed in the bill as the highest limit. As the law now stands the highest rate is $72. If a man is totally disabled under the existing law he is entitled to receive $72. I understand that under this bill if a man is totally disabled he would be entitled to receive $24. Therefore it is fair to presume that the Department will so administer the office that a man who has a small disability will not receive any more than a man now on the roll is receiving.

The reason why I said that it does not seem to me that the committee are going to give us any further information was because the Senator in charge of the bill declares that it is impossible to do it. I do not know myself any way to arrive at what the bill is going to cost, and I think we shall have to shut our eyes and vote for it, if we do vote for it, with the understanding that it is going to cost a good deal of money. I know that when the arrears-of-pensions act was passed, a measure of which I entirely approved, a provision of law that I think ought not to have been limited to 1880, we were told that it would add only a few million dollars, when it has added an immense sum.

So far as the beneficiaries under that act are concerned it was a contract with the Government. The Government entered into a contract with all the soldiers that if they were disabled in the service it would pay them a pension. This is not a contract. This is a bounty which we propose to give to show our appreciation of their patriotic service, and in doing this we have a right to guard the measure in any shape we choose and to limit it as we see fit. We are under no moral obligation to do anything more than is just and proper so far as the honor of the nation requires us. If the man is poor and goes to the poor-house, I think it is something to the disgrace of the United States Government, when he has been a loyal soldier and has received his discharge in the proper manner, if he does not receive at least the pittance of a pension that is allowed to others who have served with him under like circumstances.

I am going to vote against the return of the bill to the Committee on Pensions, not because I think the bill is in the shape in which it ought to have come here, not because I am satisfied with the bill, but because I am satisfied that to recommit it will add nothing to our information on the subject.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, ordinarily I should give a silent vote upon such a question, but I deem it proper to depart from that rule for a few minutes.

I would have no objection, and have none in fact, to the reference of this matter back to the committee, as moved by the Senator from New Jersey, but whether that takes place or not, I expect to vote for the bill; so that the question of investigation concerning the amount which is to be paid under it will not determine my vote.

I have listened to the objections to the bill as well as to the statement of its merits. I am not a person who is deterred from following the inclinations of my mind and heart by the outcry that it will take a good deal of money out of the Treasury. Sir, it is active, circulating money that is a blessing; and it is dead, unspeeding money that is a curse. The worst evil of our times is the rapid accumulation of large sums of capital in a few hands. That is the cause of distress throughout the land. It is the cause of strikes. It deprives labor of its opportunities.

I say again that the worst evil which overshadows the Republic and all its best interests at this time is the tendency to accumulate immense estates and to withdraw the circulation of the country from the many into the hands of the few. It is the busy, active, circulating dollar that does the people good.

Mr. EUSTIS. The silver dollar?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, as the Senator from Louisiana well says, the silver dollar, as well as every other good dollar with equal purchasing power; and I know no dollar, the silver dollar included, which does not pay for a meal's victuals, or a suit of clothes, or any other article of need or comfort, as well as the gold dollar or any other piece of circulation.

I therefore do not deprecate the appropriation of enough to pay the soldiers of this country liberally. I do not deprecate that degree of expansion of the currency which follows it. I say here, that beginning with the closing year of the panic which afflicted this country from 1873 to 1878, from that time forward the money which has been annually paid on pension account has in a large degree averted hard times, oppression, financial panics, and the overthrow of the prosperity of the laboring people.

We are now hard upon a crisis of great peril to the business interests and to the labor interests of this country. The money which goes out through the channel of pensions is not merely beneficial to the pensioner who directly receives it; it passes into every channel of industry and trade; it pays debts on all hands.

I have heard allusion made in this discussion to the question of arrears, that it involved a large amount. It did, and it did a vast deal of good, North and South, East and West. There is nothing sectional in a full circulating medium. I have traveled over the State of Indiana and seen the little white houses built in a number of instances, hundreds of them, by the amount received in a considerable sum at a time for arrears of pension. That money did not stay in the hands of any one man or any narrow circle, but circulated everywhere; it bought lumber, bought nails, bought shingles, bought glass, bought flooring, bought furniture, and paid for these articles and brought ease to the business interests for miles around.

I wish to say a word so far as the sectional aspects of this question are concerned. I presume never as long as we live will the incidents of the war fail to revive in our minds the recollections of that war. It would not be possible in the economy of human nature that it should be otherwise. I wish to say, however, that there never was a nobler spectacle, more generous, magnanimous, and unselfish presented upon the face of the earth in the annals of mankind, than has been presented by the people of the South as represented on this floor and on the floor of the other House of Congress, in year after year ungrudgingly and unmurmuringly voting for large sums pensioning the victors in the great conflict of the past.

But there is this to say to them and for them: There is a compensation to them even. The money thus spent, nearly a hundred millions a year, expanding the currency to that extent, is confined to no lines. It goes to New Orleans; it goes to the great State of Georgia; it finds its way to Arkansas and to Mississippi, and through all the channels of trade and industry throughout this wide extended country. Its immediate blessing, perhaps, is more direct to the communities of the North, but at last it percolates and finds its way throughout all the communities, and is a blessing to them all alike. I am glad it is so, for such magnanimity and unselfish devotion and patriotism to the institutions of the country as they stand should have something back in the way of compensation.

I will say further to my Southern friends, that their course upon this subject has not been barren of results or barren of response from the people of the North. If my Southern friends around me will think for a moment, the course of this Government so far as pecuniary and financial dealing with them is concerned has not been illiberal. I will not pause now to speak of the great educational bill which recently passed this body and which is yet pending in another, where I hope it will be adopted. I know there is difference of opinion among Southern Senators as to the power of the Government to enact such legislation, but there can be no difference of opinion among Southern gentlemen as to the grand liberality, the grand national generosity, and the great conception of the future of education on the part of those who originated that measure. There can be no two opinions upon that subject.

I may be permitted also, while I am on my feet, to say to Senators from the South who have to answer to their people (and I do not expect men to forget their own sections and their own constituencies), that those people can be easily reminded of many other acts besides the educational bill calculated to reconcile them to the generosity and magnanimity of their representatives on the subject of pensions. This Government has been liberal and great in its appropriations for the improvements of the rivers and harbors of the whole country, the South well included. She has not been treated as a step-sister when it comes to these benefactions from the Government. I, too, have voted for every one of them, on the principle largely that I shall vote for this measure, because the circulation of money employing labor and improving the country is the way to develop its greatness, its strength, and to give to the people the blessings of industry and prosperity in their own homes.

Where have we fallen short in our improvements of the Mississippi River and the other great water courses which interlace the entire South? In our careful expositions of the great industries of the country we have done something, I hope, for the Southern people to feel as a compensation for what they have done on this great question of pensions.

Mr. President, I have felt impelled to say these things because of the position which I occupy. I do not expect miracles from my Southern friends. I am not one of those men who expect Southern Senators or Southern Members or the Southern people to repudiate and affect to scorn or rebuke the great struggle in which they were engaged. They are doing enough without that being required of them, but if a few words of mine like these may enable them to meet their constituents and reconcile them to a liberal and generous course on the great question of pensions I shall be glad. I think they can; and I shall be amply rewarded for any exertions I have made on this and other questions in their behalf by contributing, in however minor a degree, to such a result.

I have not thought it necessary, Mr. President, to discuss pensions at great length or indeed at all during the present session of Congress, but I have embraced this opportunity to give in a general way my views upon this question.

The merits of those to whom these benefactions of the Government go are beyond the reach of discussion. They rest not in the field of debate. I never want to live to see the soldiers who marched to the drum and fife in the bloom and freshness of youth passing their old age in the poor-house. Whether they were disabled by cannon-shot or saber-stroke, or subsequently by disease or the creeping debility of old age, I want to see them taken care of, and by my vote they will be taken care of.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I only desire to say, as I have been mentioned several times in connection with the discussion of this bill, that the central idea which is intended to be presented by the bill is that soldiers of the Union who are diseased from whatever cause, if not from their own folly or wickedness, should be put upon the pension-rolls if they are not able to take care of themselves. I have not examined the bill before the Senate very closely, but from my reading of it it is substantially the bill which I had the honor of reporting to the Senate two years ago, and which was passed by the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. It the same precisely, except that it is six months' service instead of three.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the bill does not go as far perhaps as that bill did, but it is because some of the provisions of that bill have been already enacted into law; so that the provisions of that bill which have not become law, as I read it, are now before the Senate.

Mr. President, the reason why I think this bill ought to be passed, in brief, is this: We are now twenty-one years since the close of the war. There are thousands and tens of thousands of soldiers of this country yet not pensioned and who have not yet made application even for pensions. Every man knows that the further away we get from the scene of action the more difficult it is for the man broken down in health, diseased in body, incapable of performing manual labor, to prove his case and show that he is entitled to a pension. So it seemed to me when I introduced this bill, and it seems to me yet, that it is the duty of this Government at this late day, two decades after the war closed, to put all the soldiers who fought for the country who are disabled and unable to care for themselves upon the pension-roll without the necessity on their part of proving that the disability was incurred in the line of duty or in the service of their country.

Unless some such bill as this is passed we shall see what we already see in part, and to which the Senator from Indiana referred—we shall see not only a few of the gallant soldiers who fought for this country in its time of peril marched off to the poor-houses, but the time will not be far distant when hundreds and thousands of as brave men as fought for the Union will be compelled to go to the poor-houses of our country unless by individual charity they are kept out.

I think the time has come when it is the duty of the National Government to do away with the necessity of that particularity of proof which has been required in the years that have gone, so that every honest soldier who fought for his country who is now disabled or who may hereafter become disabled, if it was not from his own fault or wickedness of conduct, shall go upon the pension-roll and be taken care of by the Government. I do not believe in a reckless, extravagant expenditure of money in pensioning soldiers or in any other direction; but here is a simple bill; its provisions are plain, and as has been stated by the acting chairman of the committee, as I understand him, he does not believe it will take over twenty or twenty-five million dollars per annum out of the Treasury. My own judgment is that it will not take so much, but even if it takes more, I contend that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to see that these men who fought for the flag and for the Union shall be kept out of the poor-houses of the country and not allowed to starve.

Mr. President, that is the substantial feature of this bill. There are other features in it which are of minor importance; but that is the great feature of the bill, and it is the reason why, in my judgment, the bill ought to pass.

There is another provision, that the man's enlistment shall be conclusive evidence of the fact that he was sound when he went into the service. I believe the law already is that it is prima facie evidence; but this goes further and makes it absolute. I contend that the time has come when that also should be incorporated into the law, so that twenty years or more after a man's service to the country and after the time has come when it is impossible, an absolute impossibility, that he should make the proof necessary, the Government should presume, should take it as a conclusive presumption, that he was sound when he went into the service, if there was no fraud in the manner in which he entered the service.

Mr. President, I did not rise to speak long upon this question. I believe the bill has been before the Senate long enough so that every man here understands its provisions, and probably is ready and waiting to vote; but I did not feel, as I have been referred to several times in connection with the discussion, like allowing the debate to pass over and the bill to be acted upon without giving my renewed expression to the belief that the duty of Congress is to pass the bill so that it may become a law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I presume I shall not be suspected of any want of liberality toward the veteran soldiers of this country. The accusation hitherto made has been that my course in this body has been characterized by a somewhat wanton and indifferent extravagance upon this topic.

I shall not vote for the motion to recommit this bill with or without instructions, not because it is satisfactory to me in its present condition, but because I am unable to see what advantage or benefit would be derived from any action like that contemplated by the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator will pardon me a moment. He is certainly aware of the fact that the same Congress which passes this bill will be required to raise means for its fulfillment. The Senator very well knows that an appropriation of money, of $50,000,000 or more, as I have heard it stated by different Senators in the Chamber and by persons outside the Chamber, will be involved, and this will necessarily tend to reduce the chances of other measures.

One of the objects I have in view in desiring a recommitment of the bill is that we may have the most information possible touching the amount involved, that we may be advised to the fullest extent, in order that we may make provision for the fulfillment of the promise which the bill makes. Certainly it will take but little time and we shall perhaps be better informed than we are now.

Mr. INGALLS. Obviously, Mr. President, any computation based upon the idea of obtaining statistics for consideration under the provisions of this bill would be mere conjecture and surmise. No one knows that better than the Senator from New Jersey. In the naval and military service of this country during the war there were about two million seven hundred thousand enlistments. Very nearly three million men enlisted under the flag of their country and served on sea and on land that this country might survive and that we might be here to discuss in this halting and imperfect phrase as to the measure of relief that we should bestow upon them. How many of the survivors of those two million seven hundred thousand men would apply for relief under this act the Senator from New Jersey is just as capable of computing as anybody else. There are no data upon which the computation can be made any more than one can predict how many babies will be born next year or how many birds will fly over this Capitol next fall on their way to the southward. And I have observed, notwithstanding the somewhat extravagant eulogy that the Senator from Indiana bestowed upon his associates on the other side of this Chamber, that whenever a measure for the enlargement and liberalization of the pension system is brought up in this body, or has been brought up for the past thirteen years since I have been a member thereof, some Senator of the political persuasion to which he belongs gets up with a slate and pencil and begins to figure out how much it is going to cost to accomplish this great measure of national beneficence which the Senator from Indiana approves, like myself.

I am not aware that during all that period of time there has been an objection upon the Republican side of this Chamber as to the amount of money that would be required to pension the disabled volunteer soldiers of the Republic, but it has been left for the associates of the Senator from Indiana to ask how much will all this cost, and to refuse with something of petulance and impatience, as the Senator from Missouri did the other day, as the Senator from Arkansas did the other day, to give their assent to measures of this description because they are uncertain what they will cost, and because as they say, it is time to call a halt in these matters, that the nation has gone far enough, and that too much has been paid already, that it goes as the Senator from Missouri said into the insatiable maws of the claim agents, or that this is not an impulse that arises from the great, generous heart of the nation to do justice to its defenders, but that it is a sordid and mercenary scheme engendered in the foul souls of the claim agent and the scalper and the bounty-jumper to make new raids upon the Federal Treasury. That sort of accusation has come from the other side of this Chamber. They have not been in haste to ask whether or not this is just, but they have been active to inquire how much it will cost and whether we can afford it.

Now, Mr. President, how many or how few will come under the provisions of this bill no man can tell. It is obviously impossible by any arithmetic, by any system of mathematics, by any demonstration, to declare that so many thousand veteran soldiers of the Republic will be disabled next year and need assistance from the Treasury. What, therefore, would be the use, upon that ground, for that purpose, suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, to refer this bill back to the committee? I confess that I have not the slightest idea how much this bill will cost in case it shall become a law, and I do not care how much it will cost—whether it will cost $25,000,000 or $100,000,000 in addition to what we pay now.

If there are any survivors of the veteran armies of the Republic who by reason of disability are liable to become public charges like those named by the Senator from New Hampshire, tenants of almshouses, dependent upon public charity for support, I repeat that I do not propose to inquire how much it will cost. It would be a national shame, a scandal, a disgrace, if a nation as opulent as this, with uncounted millions lying idle in its Treasury, were to permit those who had ever served under its flag to become the inmates of almshouses and county poor-houses.

I think upon reflection the Senator from New Jersey will himself become convinced that the rereference of this bill to the committee for the purpose of making the inquiry that he suggests would be futile and nugatory and useless as well, because if it be true that there are enough of the veterans of those armies in such a condition as described by the Senator from New Hampshire whose payment under this bill would require $50,000,000 annually from the Treasury, would the Senator from New Jersey refuse to pay it? I think not. I am quite sure, sir, that no matter what might be the amount which would be called for by the accomplishment of the purposes of this bill, if there should chance to be those who are entitled to its beneficence, the Senator from New Jersey would be one of the very foremost to demand that that amount should be paid.

We are coming, Mr. President, very rapidly to the idea of service pensions for the survivors of the Union armies, and I regret that the Committee on Pensions were not able to present to us a bill pure and simple for the purpose of doing one single thing, and that is to omit from the present chain of evidence necessary in a pension cause that which now requires that the disability proven to exist shall be proven also to have resulted from disability incurred in the service. As the law now stands, in the first place, military service must be established; in the next place, disability; in the third place, the connection of that disability with the military service; and in the fourth place, its continuance from the time of its occurrence down to the time when the application for pension is made.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to add one other?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. The poor fellow is frequently called upon to prove that he was a well man when he entered the service, though the Government examined him itself.

Mr. INGALLS. That I omitted, because of course it is an antecedent portion of the evidence; but I believe, though I am not clear on that point, that we have already passed a law making enlistment prima facie proof of soundness.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is in this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. No; this makes it conclusive.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Kansas is correct.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the law now to be that enlistment and acceptance constitute prima facie evidence of soundness at the time the soldier was enlisted.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that to be so, but in the practical working of the law the very slighest evidence to the contrary, or a hint even, is held to repel that presumption.

Mr. INGALLS. That shifts the burden of proof.

Mr. BLAIR. The practical result is about the same as before.

Mr. CULLOM. What does the Senator from New Hampshire say about that?

Mr. BLAIR. The law is as stated by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CULLOM. I know it is so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The provision making it prima facie evidence was enacted during the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. But notwithstanding the enactment of the law making the fact of enlistment presumptive evidence of soundness, in pracical operation, as I said, the slightest hint is held to repel it, so that, practically the poor fellow is obliged in almost every instance to prove that he was actually sound at enlistment notwithstanding the law; and a great number of cases during this very last year were rejected at the Pension Office on the ground of want of soundness at the time of enlistment, notwithstanding in some cases there had been two enlistments and two findings by the Government surgeon at those enlistments that the man was fit to perform service. Sometimes this plea has been set up against a man who performed three or four years' service, and the allegation made that he was unsound at the time of enlistment.

Mr. CULLOM. The law as it stands makes the enlistment prima facie evidence of the soundness of the man. This bill provides that the fact shall be conclusive.

Mr. BLAIR. This bill now, in section 3, ends all that, by providing that the enlistment and muster into service shall be conclusive evidence of soundness at the time of enlistment, except in cases of fraud, which, of course, vitiates everything.

Mr. INGALLS. I was about to proceed to say that I suppose the ultimate purpose of this bill is merely to omit one link in the chain of evidence now necessary to establish the right of a man to a pension; that is to say, being shown to have been a soldier and the fact of disability being established, he shall not be required to prove that that disability resulted from his military service; but that (subject to existing laws as to the rates of disability), having been enlisted in the service, he shall be entitled to a pension, whether that disability resulted from his service or not, except in cases that are known as specific, like those resulting from gunshot wounds, or fractures, or something of that kind.

But the bill of the committee, no matter what might have been their purpose, does not seem to accomplish this result. It is complicated with considerations that I think ought to have been omitted, and among others is the condition that is contained in line 11, on top of page 2, which reads:

> And shall also be dependent upon his own labor for support.

It is not clear exactly what the committee meant by that provision. The language is ambiguous. I can not tell whether if this should become a law it would be necessary for a man to prove that the disability was such that he could not support himself by his own labor, or whether having established the fact of disability, even if it did not impair his capacity to take care of himself, he should still have a pension. I submit to the Senator from New Hampshire that the bill is not explicit on that point, because there may be grades of pensionable disability that would not in any way whatever impair the capacity of a man to earn his own livelihood; yet under this bill I suppose that a liberal interpretation would be that whether he was disabled to an extent to impair his capacity to earn his own livelihood or not, having enlisted in the service he would be entitled to a pension if he were a laboring man. That is unjust. That is a distinction which ought not to exist. Either you should make the pension depend upon the inability of the man to earn his own livelihood and support, or you should give him a pension if he is disabled whether he is a laboring man or whether he is engaged in any other avocation in life.

The bill is illogical; I think it is unjust. It is in one aspect of it open to the objections that were made against what was known as the pauper law of 1818, applying to the soldiers of the Revolutionary war. If it were possible to so amend the bill as to provide either one of two things, in the first place, that any man who has been in the military service and who has been disabled from any cause not resulting from his own misconduct should receive a pension at the rate of $8 a month whether he was a laboring man or not, that would suit me; or if it should provide that any man who had been in the military or naval service of the United States who was disabled should have a pension coresponding to the rate of his disability as established by existing laws, whether he was a laboring man or not, that would be agreeable to me. I am unable to decide from the language of the bill which of these interpretations the committee desire should be placed upon it.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to suggest to the Senator that the use of this language "and shall also be dependent upon his own labor for support," was, as I understand it, and as I recollect it originally, to prevent, for instance, a man who had wealth and who was disabled from procuring a pension, it not being deemed necessary for him; but the man who in every-day life has to labor for his support to keep himself out of the poor-house or from being an object of charity, that man, whether he incurred his disability in the line of duty or since the war, should be entitled to a pension.

Mr. INGALLS. Still, does the Senator mean to say that, being dependent upon his own labor for support, if it appears that his own labor is sufficient to give him a support notwithstanding his disability, he is still entitled to a pension?

Mr. CULLOM. If a man is disabled so that he can not labor, he certainly should be pensioned.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course that goes without saying; but there are disabilities, as the Senator knows very well, which are recognized under that term, which do not destroy the capacity of a man for supporting himself by labor. Now, suppose a man had his little toe shot off during an engagement, or that he lost it in a thrashing-machine, or that he was in some way disabled through a railway accident so that he became to a certain extent disabled, technically speaking, as the pension laws now fix it, but where he is still able to support himself by his own labor, is the fact of his disability technically a fact that entitles him to a pension under this bill?

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose the same rule would apply to that case that does now under the law. If a man has lost one finger, he now gets a pension to the extent of the disability incurred thereby; and just so in the case of a disabled person under this bill. That I suppose would be the fair construction of the language used. He would secure a pension in proportion to his disability.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is the interpretation, it is obviously unjust to make this bill apply only to those who are dependent upon their own labor for support. Does that mean manual labor? Is it the intention of the committee to say that it shall be manual labor? I should like to have some information from the committee or some member of it on this subject.

Mr. BECK. I, too, want some information on that point. After reading it over I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, if the Senator from Kansas will allow me. Suppose one of our stenographers had been a soldier, had received an honorable discharge, had come out of the war healthy, but afterward lost an arm, the left arm, in a thrashing-machine, or otherwise, a year or two ago, and could still make $3,000 a year as a stenographer, is he still to be paid a pension?

Mr. CULLOM. I would ask the Senator whether he would not be paid under the law as it is?

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon; not if he lost the arm in a thrashing-machine three years ago.

Mr. CULLOM. Suppose he lost the arm in the Army and still was able to perform his duty as a stenographer.

Mr. BECK. The bill provides for a disability incurred since the war. Is a man who left the Army a perfectly healthy man who is perfectly able as a clerk or stenographer or anything else to make a handsome living, because he has been disabled by the kick of a horse or anything else in the last few years to get a pension?

Mr. CULLOM. My understanding is that every disabled soldier, whether he is able to perform labor or not, under this bill will be entitled to a pension.

Mr. BECK. Even though he has ample means of support?

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, no.

Mr. CULLOM. Not if he has ample means of support.

Mr. BECK. But his own labor——

Mr. CULLOM. Where he is "dependent upon his own labor for support" is the language of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I put the case of a clerk or a stenographer or any one who is dependent on his own labor for support, who has received an injury long after the war, having been a perfectly sound man for years after the war closed, who has had the left arm taken off by a thrashing-machine and still can write and make $3,000 a year. He is a disabled man for some purposes, but he can make his own living.

Mr. CULLOM. In proportion to his disability, according to the provisions of the bill, he is pensionable.

Mr. BECK. Therefore we are to pay all men who have been hurt in any way since the war, whether they need help or not?

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, no.

Mr. BECK. A stenographer can make his money and make an ample living, or a clerk can, although he may have lost the left hand.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Kansas will allow me a word. I believe I shall be about the fifth occupier of the floor.

Mr. INGALLS. Go on.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill contains two conditions which must be complied with, must be facts proven before a pension can be granted. One is disability, physical disability of course, and that must be ascertained by a board of examining surgeons under other regulations of law, and it will be rated anywhere from $24, which is for total incapacity to perform manual labor. The disability being ascertained and the rating or proportion of disability, the highest being total incapacity to perform manual labor, as you will see further on in the bill, and the lowest the slightest impairment of capacity to perform labor, the rating being according to the degree found between those two points, then further it must be proven that he is dependent upon his labor for support. The bill does not say that he must be dependent upon his manual labor; but he must be dependent upon his labor. He must have a physical disability which would impair that of a well man to some degree, and the degree must be ascertained. Then he must be a man who is dependent upon his labor, not upon his income from other sources, not upon his bonds or money at interest, but upon his labor for support.

Mr. BECK. Now, one word to make myself plain. The stenographer at that table has nothing to live on but what he earns by his work, his labor. He was a soldier, he was honorably discharged, he was a well man, a healthy man; and without any fault of his, either by a thrashing-machine or the kick of a horse, as I said, he has lost his left arm. He has become disabled without fault of his own; he is dependent on his labor; and yet after the loss of that arm he can still make $3,000 a year. Is he pensionable? That is the question.

Mr. BLAIR. If he is dependent on his labor, and his labor is that of a stenographer, and he is physically disabled, he will be entitled to a pension.

Mr. BECK. He has lost the left arm.

Mr. BLAIR. If he be a lawyer and dependent upon his own labor as a lawyer for his support, and is also physically disabled in a degree which is to be ascertained and might run from $24 down, then he will be entitled to a pension.

Mr. BECK. A man who has lost a leg is disabled for some purposes, but that does not disable him from being a stenographer at that table.

Mr. BLAIR. That would be a physical disability, but the degree of that physical disability settles the rate. Total disability, as you will see further on, to perform manual labor is entitled to the $24 rate. The disability would be measured and its degree determined by the proportion which it bore to total incapacity to perform manual labor. The degree of disability having thus been fixed, then the further question whether the man is dependent upon his labor for support, rather than upon outside property, is to be determined under the bill, and then the pension would be granted.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, take the case of the lawyer who was actually in the service and who had the three fingers of his left hand shot off.

Mr. BLAIR. In the service?

Mr. INGALLS. In the service. Although that mutilation of his hand does not in any way whatever interfere with his capacity to earn a livelihood in his profession, although it may be an added badge of distinction and decoration that would give him larger fees and more lucrative employment, yet under existing laws he is entitled to pension for that disability notwithstanding the fact that it does not impair or interfere in any way whatever with his capacity to earn a livelihood or support himself.

Mr. MILLER. As a lawyer.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New York says "as a lawyer." Very well; it makes no difference in speaking about the existing pension law whether a man gets his livelihood by the practice of the law, or in politics, or by following the plow, or working in a blacksmith's forge. The fact that he is disabled, whether it interferes with his capacity to get a livelihood or whether he has funds invested in Government bonds or an income from rents or from bonds and mortgages, if he has been disabled in battle, or suffered any mutilation of his person, or is crippled, he is pensioned because he is disabled. Well now I understand that this bill proposes a departure from that plan.

Mr. BLAIR. Just in this respect, which the Senator has led the way up to so distinctly: That same man who could get a pension under the general law, no matter how wealthy he might be, no matter how little disabled to get his living as a lawyer he might be, who by reason of his physical hurt is entitled to a pension under the general law, must under this law prove further that he is dependent upon his labor for support.

Mr. INGALLS. Now we will take the lawyer under this bill. Having taken him under the general pension law, now we will introduce him into this bill. Here is the lawyer who was in the military service of his country and came out without mutilation, without disability of any kind whatever, and is engaged in the active practice of his profession. We will assume that this last year, in a railway accident, he lost the three fingers of his left hand. It is a pensionable disability under existing law and as I conceive as defined by this bill. It may be that I am mistaken; but what I desire to know is whether or not in the case that I have detailed and specified that man, the lawyer, being shown to be disabled and mutilated, so far as the existing laws are concerned, would become one of the beneficiaries under this bill?

Mr. CULLOM. Suppose the lawyer should quit the law business and go to shoving a jack-plane, where would he come out then? Would he be pensionable then?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know where he would come out. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOM. Would he not be pensionable?

Mr. INGALLS. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. BLAIR. I think, as the bill stands, the lawyer in that case being dependent upon the practice of his profession for support and that being his labor, he would be entitled to pension under the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. That is not right.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not say that it is right, but I think that it is well enough. At the same time I stated early in the discussion that it might be well to insert before that word "labor" the word "manual," and say "manual labor."

Mr. INGALLS. In saying that was not right, I was hasty. It is not what I want to do; I meant to say I do not want to do that. The lawyer that is dependent upon his own labor for his subsistence and who received a disability, pensionable under other circumstances, that does not disqualify him from continuing to earn his livelihood by his labor, I do not want to pension; but I should like, if it were possible, to introduce some language of limitation in this bill which would provide that the disability should be such as would prevent a man from obtaining his livelihood in his own calling in life to which he has devoted himself. If he becomes disabled in that way, having himself been enlisted in the military service, he should be entitled to some compensation in the way of a pension to keep him out of the poor-house. I submit that this bill does not do that if the interpretation that I put upon it is correct, and I am still further fortified by the further provision that I find in lines 18, 19, 20, and 21:

> The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability.

I refer to that for the purpose of saying that in my judgment those four lines propose to apply the existing laws and regulations of the Pension Office—in other words, they propose to apply the present rates and grades of the Pension Office to the grades of disability that are provided for in this act.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the word "manual" is omitted in the eleventh line with design; but the man who is actually disabled and who is dependent upon his work, whatever it may be, for his livelihood, shall be entitled to a pension. That proposition held distinctly in mind, then the next question to be determined is how shall that man's pension be measured, for the bill provides that those disabilities from which men may come to suffer, varying as they do in degree, shall vary in the amount of pension applicable to each. If the physical disability from which a man suffers, disregarding his employment entirely, it being a physical disability, is so great that he can not perform any manual labor—whether that manual labor was the means of getting his living or not is unimportant—then he is entitled for such a degree of physical disability to $24 a month.

If his physical disability is the loss of three fingers of his hand in a railroad accident, which the Senator from Kansas supposed in his illustration, of course it is not a disability totally incapacitating him to earn his living by manual labor, and he would be rated less than $24 per month and at such degree less than $24 per month as might be determined by the examining board. So these later lines which provide for the rating of the pension from $24 down are simply a measure of the degree of pension that shall go to the degree of physical disability from which the man suffers, and that must be got from the idea of the nature of the work on which the man depends.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, will the Senator advise me why or upon what principle of justice the lawyer disabled by a railroad accident and losing three fingers of his left hand and still able to carry on the business of his profession should receive any pension at all? That is what I want to know.

Mr. BLAIR. He is disabled physically, and he is in that regard. There are very few instances of that kind, of course. But when you pass from the lawyer, who may be one in a hundred thousand or one in fifty thousand throughout the country, and you come to the case of the clerk, how is it? You may assume that there is not any great necessity that the lawyer shall receive under this general bill; but on the other hand you have to consider that there are but very few such, and that in the vicissitudes of life he may come to be dependent upon physical labor. Although then he may have to depend upon his profession, the time may come when he may have to abandon it. It is a comparatively trifling matter.

You come very soon to other classes, the clerks and the teachers of the country who have been in the service and in regard to whom the Senator from Kentucky made his inquiry. There there does not seem to be any objection. They are not a very large number, and they suffer from physical disability, and they are all to be dependent upon their labor. There does not seem to be any great objection, they having performed honorable service, to giving them a pension in proportion to the actual degree of physical disability from which they suffer. It is very true that oftentimes this disability in these classes of what you may call the higher or more intellectual occupations would not largely disable them from acquiring a livelihood in their chosen vocation; but after all there are a great many cases where it would; and if you say "manual labor" you exclude a very large class of those who ought to take under the provisions of such an act. It was on the whole thought best to omit that word "manual" as the bill came to the Senate because of the hardship that would result in such a very large class of cases if these persons in intellectual employments, if you may so call them, were omitted.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand how any modification was made by omitting the word "manual" before "labor" in line 11, if you retain it before "labor" in line 19, because that is the controlling clause.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator to reflect a moment and see if that is so. The second clause is:

> The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability.

That, without any reference whatever to what precedes in the section, is there simply to indicate a measure for the varying degrees of physical disability from which the applicant may have come to suffer, from total incapacity to perform manual labor down.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire whether it means working with his hands or something equivalent to that? When you give a lien to a laborer you do not give it to a lawyer or teacher; you use the word "laborer." I understand that word has in law, if not technically, still such a uniform signification that, independent of the observation of the Senator from Kansas, with which I entirely agree, where the phrase is used "dependent parents" which says "their own manual labor," the word "labor" has the same significance the Senator attaches to it.

Mr. INGALLS. Not only in law, but in religion; we say "the laborer is worthy of his hire." That does not mean the lawyer is worthy of his hire; it means the laboring man.

Mr. BLAIR. Then the bill is right as it is, and the Senator's criticism is of no consequence.

Mr. INGALLS. No.

Mr. BLAIR. So I am glad he is satisfied.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will not understand me. I speak from an entirely amicable standpoint.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that.

Mr. INGALLS. I shall vote for this bill, unless it can be improved or we shall get something better. I merely suggest the difficulty in the way of uniting the friends of some intelligible pension measure on this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator's objections to the bill, which seem to be as the phraseology now stands as I understand him, may be resolved in favor of the existing phraseology.

Mr. INGALLS. If we can not get anything better.

Mr. BLAIR. If we can get better, very well. I am ready for better phraseology.

Mr. INGALLS. I want to say further that I can see no reason why there should be a reduction of the existing rate for total incapacity to perform manual labor from $72, which is now the sum that is paid monthly, to $24, as provided in this bill. If there is any reason in the existing law that gives to a pensioner who is entirely disqualified for taking care of himself and requires the constant aid and attention of another person $72, then there is no reason, if you are going to be just to these men who did service under the same flag and encountered the same difficulties, why you should make a discrimination and pay those who are the beneficiaries of this bill one-third only of the amount allowed by existing law to those who are disabled in the service.

Mr. BLAIR. The reason of that is this: that this is an extension of pensions to an entirely new class who are supposed not to have derived their disability by virtue of their service, and therefore we may justly deal with them upon a different basis as to the degree of pension which we give them from that which we have adopted in treating those who contracted their disability in the service itself.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Kansas give way for an executive session?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT SANDY BAY, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before the doors are closed I should like to make a report from a committee. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report the papers accompanying the letter of the Secretary of War, pertaining to the harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, Massachusetts, with the recommendation that they be not printed, and ask that the papers and accompanying maps be sent to the Committee on Commerce.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

John H. Farley, of Ohio, to be collector of internal revenue for the eighteenth district of Ohio.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 1304) of John H. Farley, of Onio, to be collector of internal revenue for the eighteenth district of Ohio, in place of Worth S. Streator, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. Farley is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Mr. Streator, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 16, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of Worth S. Streator, late collector of internal revenue for the district of Ohio, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions.

But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

A resolution, as follows, was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Finance, April 6, 1886, in relation to this and all similar letters to the foregoing:

"Resolved, That the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance, dated March 16, 1886, or subsequently, in relation to the suspension of collectors of internal revenue, should be received and held as honest declarations made in good faith that there are no charges or papers on file in the Department reflecting in any manner against their moral or official conduct or character."

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Farley.

In view of the importance of the subject I recommend that provision be made by law for a preliminary survey of the boundary line in question by officers of the United States, in order that the information necessary for the basis of a treaty between this country and Great Britain for the establishment of a definite boundary line may be obtained; and I also recommend that the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated for the expenses of making such survey.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the amendments of the Senate to the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, are now open to general debate, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, for the present I shall confine what I have to say to the sixth amendment of the Senate to the Post-Office appropriation bill, which may be succinctly stated as what is known as the subsidy clause. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a statement from the Superintendent of Foreign Mails defining sea and inland postage.

The Clerk read as follows:

Q. Define sea and inland postage.
A. It is the gross revenue collected on the mails destined to foreign countries.
Q. On what basis is it calculated?
A. Five cents per each one-half ounce, or $1.60 per pound, on letters and post-cards, and 1 cent per 2 ounces, or 8 cents per pound, on other articles.
Q. Please define sea postage.
A. It is an indefinite term. Under the Berne treaty, which went into effect July 1, 1875, the rate of extraordinary sea transit of the mails was fixed at 25 francs per kilogram, or $4.82 for 2 pounds 3 ounces for letters and post-cards, and 1 franc (19 cents) per kilogram (2 pounds 3 ounces) on other articles, and the ordinary rate of sea transit of the mails was fixed at 6 francs 50 centimes, or about 60 cents per pound, on letters and post-cards, and 50 centimes on other articles. The Paris convention of June, 1878, by paragraph 2, article 4, page 5, reduced the international sea transit rates of the mails as follows: Where the extraordinary rates of sea transit had been hitherto fixed at 25 francs it was reduced to 15 francs, and where the ordinary sea transit rate had been fixed at 6 francs 50 centimes per kilogram, it was reduced to 5 francs, or 44 cents per pound. As the United States Government was a party to, and is bound by, this conventional treaty this Department has accepted and taken these rates to be sea postage on the mails conveyed by the various steamship companies. There is no statutory law defining sea or inland postage, and this Department has been governed solely by the Universal Postal Union treaty.

Mr. BLOUNT. This rule of payment for carrying our mails is the only provision upon the subject at this time. We are brought now to examine the Senate amendment, which is based on an allegation that the compensation is inadequate, as well as on various others. It will be observed that in the first portion of that amendment there is a declaration that its object is—

To secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails.

To do this the Postmaster-General is directed to advertise for proposals, to contract with owners of American steamships—

For a term of not less than three years nor more than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points, in the most direct and feasible sailing course between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

So far the object seems to be provided with language out of which some results are to be anticipated. He is required up to this point to provide for greater speed and a greater number of trips. After that, however, tne friends of the steamship companies, discontented with this arrangement, apprehending that the Postmaster-General up to this point having a discretion in reference to this matter might exercise it to an end they were not seeking, found means of adding to that the following clause:

And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services he shall, so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places, respectively, in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels, and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned.

It is to be observed that this last clause is the gist of this whole amendment. This sum of money is to be confined to the payment of American steamers between points specifically designated. It can go nowhere else. And if these companies are not willing to give any increase of trips, or increase of speed, or particular size of vessels, or any other requirement which would seem wise and proper regarding the postal and commercial facilities of this country, they have but to say to the Postmaster-General, "We decline; we shall continue to run the lines we have as we run them now. And what can you do? Here is a declaration that if you can not negotiate with us after advertisement under the first portion of this paragraph then you shall, if possible, as the language runs, have the mail carried on steamships of this kind at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a mile. We have these steamers; we are willing to carry the mails at 50 cents a mile, and the law takes from you all discretion. We are at your service; give us this money."

It is equivalent to an absolute direction to the Postmaster-General, and such is his understanding of it. The Postmaster-General is required to have these mails carried upon the existing lines of steamers. As the service stood last year some of these lines contained foreign-constructed steamers. Take the New York, Havana and Mexican line. Five of the steamships of that line are American and four are foreign vessels. On it, therefore, under this law the Postmaster-General is compelled to reduce the number of trips. And so it happens on other lines. You have, therefore, an expenditure of $800,000 which will not give you any greater number of trips, which will result in your getting fewer trips, in actually narrowing your foreign mail facilities.

In addition to this he must contract, if he contracts at all, for a term not less than three nor more than five years. When he shall have given to these lines 50 cents a mile for either period, it works an absolute inhibition upon any other company attempting to traverse the same route. Fifty cents a mile each way, running up into thousands of dollars, gives them an advantage over any other line, and prevents the construction of new ships for the purpose of going on these routes for that period. Therefore you have, so far as your commerce is concerned, blocked the way for an increase of lines for commercial purposes. You have prevented by your law any increase of the postal service during that time. Other vessels will not come in when you want more trips, when you want more speed, under circumstances like these.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you will not, as I have already stated, get an additional trip by it. On the contrary, you will have reduced your service.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to a statement from the Superintendent of the Foreign Mail Service, prepared under the direction of the Postmaster-General. In relation to this matter, the first line to which I call the attention of the committee is the New York, Havana and Mexican. Article 4 of its contract with the Mexican Government of January 17, 1881, extended to 1886, requires that—

All letters, official documents, and other packages dispatched by the administration of posts for the ports at which the steamers are pledged to call—both going and coming from Mexico will be transported free by the company during the period it enjoys the subsidies.

Mark you—

Article 7 of the postal convention between the United States and Mexico of December 11, 1861, provides for the transmission of American mails through Mexico without charge.

An extract from the letter of the Mexican secretary of the interior, dated August, 1885, addressed to the director-general of posts of Mexico, and by him transmitted to this Department, is as follows:

It is stated in the contracts made with these companies, the New York, Havana and Mexican, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and the California and Mexican line, that they are obliged to convey, both going and coming, the official and public correspondence.

Virtually, the steamer may be considered as a traveling office of the Mexican post-office whose services the other countries of the Postal Union may employ by paying to the Mexican post-office the transit expenses, in accordance with articles 3 and 4 of the Paris convention.

Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Paris convention, reads thus:

Unless there be a contrary arrangement, the direct sea conveyance performed between two countries by means of packets or vessels depending upon one of them shall be considered as a third service, and such conveyance, as well as any performed between two offices of the same country by the intermediary of maritime or territorial services maintained by another country is regulated by the stipulation of the following article.

Article 4 fixes the rate of sea transit for such service at 5 francs per kilogram for letters and postal cards and 50 centimes per kilogram for other articles.

Now, under this arrangement here is the New York, Havana and Mexican line, which belongs, so far as mail facilities are concerned, to the Mexican Government, receiving a subsidy for carrying their mails to this country and carrying back our mails. The pending proposition designs to give that company $58,700—to give it to them absolutely. It is ours now, but this bill proposes that you shall give them that amount as an absolute donation.

But supposing this obligation on the part of this company to the Mexican Government did not exist, I ask attention to some statistics as to what you would pay this line under the present law or treaty stipulations compared with what this bill proposes to pay them. I have here a statement from which, as I intend to print it in full in the RECORD, I shall read now only brief extracts.

The price per pound at subsidy rates, 50 cents a mile, is $1.18.2. The price per pound at sea and inland postage is 24 cents. And that is above their advertised express rates.

Now let us examine the case of the Pacific Steamship line running from San Francisco to Panama. Article 4 of its contract with the Mexican Government provides that the company obligates itself to convey free on its steamers correspondence and packages of prints dispatched by post-offices and intended for the port of call or originating in it, the company being obliged to receive or deliver on its account in each port such correspondence and to take care of it while on board their steamers.

The extracts from the letter of the Mexican secretary of the interior and the observations set forth in connection with the New York, Havana and Mexican line apply likewise here; also article 7 of the postal convention between the United States and Mexico and the extracts from the Paris convention given above.

So here you have a second line under contract with the Mexican Government to carry the Mexican mails to this country and to take the American mails to Mexico. Now it will be observed that the pound rate here is $$5.70\frac{6}{10}$, while at sea and inland postage it would be 24.4 cents.

The contract of the California and Mexican Steamship Company with the Mexican Government contains the same provisions, and the various regulations of the Postal Union which I have cited in other cases apply here.

I ask gentlemen, especially those who are seeking to pay only adequate compensation for mail service, to mark the rate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me a single question?

Mr. BLOUNT. In a moment. The price per pound at subsidy rates on this line is $8.18; the price per pound at sea and inland postage is 27 cents.

It will be observed, therefore, that when they come to pay these steamships at the rate of 50 cents a mile, the rate per pound is on one line two dollars and a fraction, on another five dollars and a fraction, and on another over $8.18 a pound. What does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to ask?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Georgia, in referring to the New York, Havana and Mexican line to Mexico, assumed, I thought from his statement, that the subsidy of the Government applied to the carriage of mails from the United States to Mexican ports.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would state that in the New York——

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, my friend will have an hour to discuss this question, and I have not any time to spare.

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply ask this for information.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand. I will say to my friend that I shall publish this document in full in the RECORD, and from it he will see very clearly what is claimed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I merely wanted to be informed as to this particular point. The statement which I have here, which is almost identical with the one from which the gentleman from Georgia has been quoting, only states that the subsidy is for the carriage of the Mexican mails from San Francisco to the United States.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, Mr. Chairman, my friend will have his hour. Now look at the Brazil line. On that at subsidy rates the price per pound is 2.43\frac{3}{10}$; at sea and inland postage it is 21 cents.

As to the mails to Guatemala and Costa Rica there is a long statement, which I will not take time to read but will ask gentlemen to examine in print.

On the Pacific line to Hawaii and Australia at 50 cents a mile the rate per pound is $1.71; at sea and inland postage it is 22 cents.

Take the mails to Japan and China. That mail has been carried since 1885 by the Oriental and Occidental line. Should it be taken by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, by reason of its ships being of American construction, we would pay at subsidy rates $2.91 a pound, while at sea and inland postage the rate per pound would be 26 cents. The total amount of money we would pay at subsidy rates would be $109,620, as against $3,500 now paid to the Oriental and Occidental line for the same service. That line is anxious to continue to carry the mail at that rate—at a rate per annum equal to what is now proposed to be paid per month to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. And this Oriental and Occidental Company, while all its vessels save one are of foreign registry, is as much American property as the Pacific Mail line.

Now let us examine the statement as to the Venezuela mails. The Red D line would get the appropriation should this amendment become law. At 50 cents a mile, that company would get $104,244; at sea and inland postage the amount would be $3,901.

The price per pound, at subsidy rates, is $6.25; at sea and inland postage it would be 23 cents. The companies carrying the mails for Hayti, San Domingo, and Turk's Island would receive under this arrangement $22,355, as against $552.79. The pound rate would be $2.83, as against 18 cents for sea and inland postage. The mails for the Isthmus and the Pacific coast by way of the Pacific Mail Steamship line from New York to Colon would be paid for at the rate of 69 cents a pound, as against 17 cents sea and inland postage, and 6 cents the price actually paid.

This statement, therefore, discloses first the fact that you propose to pay to lines belonging to other governments, under contract with other governments, for a service they are already engaged to perform at the rate of 50 cents a mile. You thereby disregard all reference to distance and all reference to service. You tie down your Government to the lines now in existence; and you prevent any increase of them. You utterly ignore all commercial advantages which might be secured by any prescription as to the size of the ship, the regulation of freight, or any other consideration which would advance your postal or commercial facilities.

I wish now to invite attention to a table showing the total number of nautical miles traveled exclusively by vessels American built and registered, during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, to China, Japan, Hawaii, New Zealand, Australia, Mexico, the States of Central America, the Bahamas, Cuba, Hayti, Venezuela, Brazil, and the Argentine Republic. (See exhibit attached.) This statement also shows the sum which would be derived from this service at the rate of 50 cents a mile. The amount after careful calculation, taking out all the foreign ships, is $815,000.88. A little more would be required to pay the 50-cent rate than the sum in the amendment. In this connection I wish to call attention to a communication from the Superintendent of Foreign Mails as to the effect on the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. He says that this would be $325,000 more than the sea postage paid to that company for the same service during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885.

It is proper, Mr. Chairman, that I should qualify in one particular the statement that we would have no increase of mail service. The Venezuelan line, which now declines to carry the mail to Venezuela, would carry it in a shorter time than the line now employed. With this exception there would be no increase in any particular, and there will be a large decrease on other lines and in the service.

I ask in this connection the attention of the committee to the subsidies paid to steamship companies in 1884, taken from the general statistics of postal service, published by the international bureau, Berne. From this it appears France is paying $5,152,388; Great Britain, $3,006,000, &c. It will take some time to read them all, but the total is $11,661,118.22. (See exhibit attached.)

Then I invite your attention to the table showing the surplus and deficiency in foreign countries of the Universal Postal Union during the year 1884, from general statistics of the postal service published by the international bureau, Berne, 1886. From this it appears Great Britain, which is commended for her subsidies to her foreign lines, after having granted these subsidies, has of surplus revenue, $12,492,856; Germany, $6,448,000; France, $5,732,000; Austria, $2,009,000, and so on to the end of that column, while on the other side, the United States has the largest deficiency of any country, to wit: $4,000,000, in round numbers; Brazil, $2,501,000; Russia, $1,057,000, and so on throughout that list. (See exhibit.)

Now, Mr. Chairman, during the last Congress the Senate of the United States placed upon an appropriation bill to be paid to these lines of steamers the sum of $400,000. Its subsequent history I need not recall. The Senate of the United States now proposes for that same, or rather less, service the sum of $800,000.

From time to time as this subject has been discussed the friends of the amendment have seen fit to parade tabular statements showing the subsidies paid by Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and other countries for the purpose of improving their commercial intercourse. Notwithstanding the act is alleged to be for mail pay, the argument of its friends is continually running that it is to improve and extend our commercial facilities. They confine themselves to these tabular statements. These gentlemen with broad and great views standing upon a pinnacle and surveying the great nations of the earth in their commercial intercourse can observe nothing but tabular statements of subsidy amounts and have you instructed from these alone as to what other nations were and are doing.

I invite your closer attention to the action of several of the European governments. In Executive Document No. 172 of this session, on page 5, you will find the following statement:

THE FRENCH BOUNTY LAW.

The bounty proposition in France assumed a definite form by the promulgation of a law in January, 1881, by which the privileges enjoyed by ship-builders since 1866 of importing free of duty all materials used in the construction and equipment of vessels were abolished, and a system of bounties paid directly from the state treasury was substituted. These bounties were fixed at the following rates: For iron or steel vessels, 60 francs per ton, gross measurement; for wooden vessels of 200 tons or more, 20 francs per ton; for wooden vessels of less than 200 tons, 10 francs per ton; for composite vessels, 40 francs per ton; for engines placed on board steamers, and for auxiliary apparatus, such as steam-pumps, donkey-engines, winches, ventilators worked by machinery, also their boilers and pipes, 12 francs per kilogram. These various allowances were payable on the delivery of the French register by the receiver of customs at the nearest place of construction.

Nor was the state aid confined to the construction of ships only; it was extended to the navigation of them.

ART. 9. As compensation for charges imposed on the mercantile navy for the recruitment and service of the military navy, a navigation bounty shall be granted, during ten years from the date of publication of this law, to all French vessels, sailing or steam.

This bounty is applicable only to foreign-going vessels.

It is fixed at 1.50 francs per register ton and per 1,000 miles' run for vessels of French construction fresh off the stocks and decreases annually by—

	Francs.
For wooden vessels	0.075
For composite vessels	0.075
For iron vessels	0.05

For foreign-built vessels the bounty is reduced to one-half of the above-assigned amount.

One-half of the bounty allowed by France is allowed on ships of foreign construction, and it is competent for any citizen of France to go into any market of the world and buy his ship and put it on the ocean, not only in competition with the French but all the vessels of the world.

You have, therefore, as the French policy, a bounty on ship-building, a bounty on navigation, and the right of Frenchmen to buy their ships as cheaply as they can anywhere on the face of the globe and register them as French vessels. In the matter of subsidizing there, it is by competition. Furthermore, they may require of any French ships, where the lines are not subsidized or are not under contract, to carry her mails.

Now let us examine Germany. On page 61 of this same report, the annual aid granted by the German Government to promote ship-building is the duty free on the importation of steam-engines and boilers used in ship-building, while the free importation of sea and river vessels rather protects the interests of the coast and export trade.

No. 15, clause d, of the German tariff of July 15, 1879, still in force, reads as follows:

(d) Sea and river vessels, inclusive of the customary ship utensils belonging thereto (marine stores), anchors, anchor and other ship chains, as well as steam boilers and engines, free.

Some of the above privileges seem to have been given to German ship-builders in compliance with their petition in common, under date of April 29, 1879, addressed to the German Reichstag, for a duty-free importation of materials necessary for ship-building and ship engines and boilers.

Again, as to ship navigation:

The ocean postal service of the German Empire in direct intercourse with transmarine countries is at present—and as long as the subsidized steamship lines have not yet assumed the service to commence about the month of July next—carried on by ten private steamship lines, which keep up by regular trips the communication between Hamburg and Bremen and ports of the United States and of other countries.

Up to the 1st of July next the result of the action of the German Government in this regard is that she never aided in the building of ships; she never subsidized any lines; and notwithstanding this, while France has been subsidizing and giving bounties, German ship-building and German tonnage have gone on increasing at a rate beyond that of France. And she has been paying this service 320,000 marks.

I ask gentlemen who have belittled the foreign-mail pay of the United States to pay attention to the statement contained in this report:

That her annual pay is 320,000 marks on all these lines.

Which is about $80,000. This great German Empire, because she had a contract to take effect in the future, has been paraded a subsidy-giving government, notwithstanding her past history, disclosing the fact that the entire foreign-mail pay is less than $100,000. We have been ridiculed, notwithstanding this fact, for allowing Germany, France, England, and the other subsidized lines to dominate the seas, as we are told.

On page 87 of the same report you will find reference to the character of these German subsidized lines, and I want to invite American legislators to the zealous care with which the government is guarded by the German law rather than by those loose methods which would give $800,000 without any advantage to anybody except the owners of the American steamship lines. You will find in article 17 the following:

ART. 17. The receipt for freight and passage money remains to the contractor. The tariff will be fixed with the agreement of the imperial chancellor. For this purpose a sketch of the tariff must, before they are enforced, be laid before the imperial chancellor at least three months before commencing the business. Any later changes in the tariff must be notified to the imperial chancellor at least six weeks before the time they will be enforced, and shall be deemed valid if during that time no other determinations are received from the imperial chancellor. In regard to the publishing of the tariffs and changes submitted the contractor has to comply with the instructions given by the imperial chancellor.

Rates of passenger fare and rates of freight are regulated by the assent of the imperial chancellor, lest with these privileges they should be able to destroy other companies; for the same hand is directing them and keeping on an equal footing the subsidized as well as the unsubsidized lines.

Again:

ART. 20. The contractor binds himself to forward at a rate of 20 per cent. less than the fixed tariff: (a) Officials traveling in the service of the empire, or in the service of a federal state; (b) the men relieved and relieving of the imperial navy, and those belonging to the imperial navy who are on account of sickness or for punishment returned to Germany; (c) arms, ammunition, outfits, and provisions for the imperial navy. The number of men mentioned under b, however, shall not exceed sixty-five on the same ship without the consent of the contractor.

Then again I ask your attention to a paragraph contained in article 26. After providing for the keeping of the accounts, the following occurs:

If it is proved by the separate account in this way that at the expiration of the first five years of this agreement the contractor has made a surplus yearly, the contractor shall be bound for the time to come, on demand and at the choice of the imperial chancellor, to carry out further the discharging of the purposes and conditions in this contract for half the amount of the respective sum, or to refund to the imperial treasury half of the surplus mentioned.

The line is provided with ample pay and its freight rates are regulated, and the character of the ship shall be as good as that of any other ship that runs between the designated ports. If there be a surplus at the end of five years the mail pay shall be reduced half, or one-half the surplus shall be refunded to the imperial treasury.

How business-like; how worthy of the great statesman at the head of the German Empire! See his directing hand controlling the destines of his people, rising high above the influences of capital about him, and making regulations for the benefit of her commerce, of her postal service, in the interest of the German people, rather than in the interest of such men as are seeking, without furnishing return to the government, to take from its treasury enormous sums of money.

I ask next your attention to Great Britain. On page 98 of the same report you have this statement:

Any nation can have its vessels constructed in this country on the same footing as British owners, and no fines or penalties are incurred in having such vessels registered in any other country. All materials used in ship-building are admitted free of duty.

BOUNTIES, ETC.

The British Government does not grant bounties, subsidies, or privileges to ship-builders. It does, however, pay for the mail service. This service is awarded by open competition. Any company which has steamers having the requirements demanded by the post-office authorities may tender for this service.

There are no privileges accorded to vessels sailing under the British flag not enjoyed by vessels of other nations. Italy stands as to her policy about as France does. I am admonished that my time is expiring, and therefore I can not enter into details as to that service.

We are continually reminded of the condition of the American carrying trade. I ask your attention to the map in front of the Clerk's desk. I understand it has been prepared at the foreign mail office. You will see that there is on the transatlantic service no American line. You will find a few lines of American registered vessels on the Pacific and a few running down from New Orleans to Central and South America.

The South American Commission declared that—

Of the eight hundred millions of merchandise exported from the United States less than 7 per cent. went to countries south of us; only 2 per cent. of our manufactured products goes to foreign markets, and the percentage that reaches Central and South America is too small to be estimated.

The amendment gives up all thoughts of carrying that eight hundred millions, less 7 per cent; it abandons that at the instigation of certain steamship lines, perhaps for reasons no doubt honorable in their estimation. But why is this? Why should that great Atlantic Ocean and these American ports fail to disclose an American registered line of steamers carrying the American flag to Europe? You can not carry the commerce of the world unless you can carry it as cheap as other countries. You can not build a ship as cheap as France, as Germany, as England. You require all your ships for register shall be American-built. The blank place for the American ships on that map is the result. These other great nations provide their citizens may go anywhere on the face of the earth and buy their ships at the cheapest rate and enter into competition for the carriage of merchandise. And yet we stand here and, instead of facing the truth, attempt to delude ourselves as to this policy by saying that it comes from the fact that we do not subsidize. The practical sense of any disinterested man must revolt at any such conclusion.

Why have we lost this commerce? Gentlemen have been in the habit of saying from a partisan standpoint that it was because perhaps one or the other party was in power. The exact truth is easy of ascertainment. When we were the second power on the face of the globe in the carrying trade of the world the cheapest ship manufactured was American. The time came when the demands of commerce required we should have first iron and then steel steamers, and then instead of being able to construct the cheapest ship ours was the most costly. I shall ask to publish a table containing a statement of the increase at one navy-yard in England during the period of seven years from 10 per cent. of steel tonnage to about 50 per cent.

USE OF STEEL AND DEVELOPMENT OF MARINE ENGINEERING.

The general depression in the trade of ship-building has not only affected the prosperity of the workmen in connection with the trade and the prosperity of their employers, but it has also tended to some extent to diminish the number of novelties in the way of vessels which have been produced in our Clyde shipyards. We may, however, note the steadily increasing use of steel, and the greater favor with which it is regarded by both ship-builders and ship-owners. The following table bears out this fact, as will be clearly seen from a glance at the column giving the percentage of steel tonnage to the total tonnage of vessels launched:

Year.	Total tonnage.	Tonnage of steel.	Percentage of steel to total tonnage.
1879	174,750	18,000	About 10½
1880	241,114	42,000	About 17½
1881	341,022	66,609	About 19½
1882	391,934	108,254	About 27½
1883	419,664	129,651	About 31
1884	296,854	133,670	About 45
1885	193,458	92,677	About 48

We can not build as cheaply as other nations. We are not allowed to buy, and the disgraceful record on that map arises from the narrow-minded policy here stated. Our consul at Marseilles writes thus:

From this distance even the present collapse of maritime interests is thought to bring to our country a fortuitous opportunity.

"Ah!" said a marine broker of Marseilles recently, "you Americans hold all the winning cards. While we in Europe are overburdened with costly armies, you have only a single army corps to guard your fortifications and watch the Indians; while we have been squandering millions upon iron-clad fleets which are obsolete, without ever having fought a battle, you can now build a navy that will include and surpass all that we have impoverished ourselves to learn; and as for a merchant marine, you have only to change a paragraph in your shipping laws and your merchants can buy everything they want, the best steam fleets that can be built, at any price, from half their cost down to their value as old iron."

FRANK H. MASON, Consul.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Marseilles, March 9, 1886.

Mr. Chairman, I have seen it stated in various quarters, in the press and in legislative bodies, that we have a country south of us and we ought to take its trade. It is said that this amendment opens up a field for our commerce, and it has been addressed as a special argument to gentlemen coming from the section where I reside that it was calculated to build up Southern States in their manufactures. I am admonished by the passing time that I shall not be able to recur to these statistics.

Allow me to recur for a moment, however, to Venezuela and to Brazil. You have six trips to and from Venzuela—six trips either way per month. Your goods go down there. They are simply the cheaper grade of cotton goods. When they get there the English manufacture is cheaper than ours; we therefore can sell but a small part of what those people buy.

As to Brazil, the cotton goods furnished by Great Britain and the United States are as 27 to 1. Why? Because the British plain piece-goods sell at 5.65 cents, while the American sell at 9.78 cents. The printed British goods sell at 7.79 cents, and the American at 10.39 cents. It is absurd to talk about controlling a market under such circumstances. It will only serve to delude and frame a public opinion, ignorant and misled, and tributary to subsidy advocates; this, and nothing more.

Let us observe, Mr. Chairman, for a moment the proposition in this amendment. Only 7 per cent. of your exports go to countries south of us. Your grain finds its way to Europe. Two-thirds of the cotton product of the South goes to Liverpool. All abandoned! No effort on behalf of our agriculture to reduce the freight rates on our grain or on our cotton. That field is all abandoned. Lines are to be subsidized to Central and South America, where statistics show we are unable to do much in the way of trade unless we allow the American merchant to buy his ships as the citizens of other countries are permitted to buy theirs. And yet, sir, with this state of facts and with a few factories in the Southern States, you are told that you are going to build up that great agricultural population by subsidizing these few steamship companies, ignoring the real sources of wealth. And this, too, when you can not add a ship or a trip to our transportation facilities.

[Here the hammer fell.]

APPENDIX.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: I herewith inclose you some comments upon the proposed amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill which seem to me to be worthy of consideration. Also a new table of mileage made by American-built ships in American lines last year.

I am, sir, very respectfully, yours,

WM. F. VILAS, Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. H. BLOUNT, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

Memoranda in regard to the Senate amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill in relation to the transportation of the foreign mails.

I. It will be observed at once that the proposed amendment provides for a gratuity merely to existing steamship lines wholly unnecessary to accomplish the purpose of carrying the mails. The statements in regard to the present arrangements for the carrying of these mails to the countries in question, which have been directed to be prepared in the office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, will make this very obvious. They show that the mail carriage, as at present conducted, is as frequent, as regular, and as speedy as it would probably be in the power of the Department to provide even with the aid of this subsidy, with but one or two exceptions to be mentioned; and that the price proposed, when contrasted in the rate per pound, inordinately exceeds any fair pretext of mere compensation for the transportation of the mails by a carrier going on his own business, at his own convenience, when he pleases, and how he pleases.

On the route to Venezuela the price would enable and require the Department to use the services of the American Steamship line, and give a little quicker dispatch than that which the Department has been limited to the use of, since the Red "D" line refused to carry the mails in the manner set forth in the annual report; but it would probably be no better service than was rendered by the same company during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, and would cost for the carriage of about 8 tons of mail during the entire year, which at the parcels dispatch rates given in that company's tables would have cost less than $1,200, and which at sea and inland postage would have been less than $4,000, the round sum of $66,000; or at the rate of $3.90 per pound, instead of 7 cents per pound, at their parcels dispatch rates. As that company has for years carried this same mail for a price not exceeding $1,500 per annum, and as it is probable the greater share of the mail relates to the freights transported on the vessels, it is certain that such a sum would be properly characterized as a gratuity, or subsidy, instead of compensation. This is one of the excepted cases referred to above. I will now mention the other.

On the route to Japan and China, if a contract should be made under this enactment it would go necessarily to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company which sails a line of American-built and registered ships. That company makes a sailing every twenty days only, while the Occidental and Oriental line, which now carries the mails, also makes sailings every twenty days. The operation of this subsidy would therefore be, so far as mail carriage is concerned, simply to change it from one company to another. The company which now carries the mail does so at about $6,000 a year, less than $7,000, and has faithfully and fairly continued to carry the mail when the Pacific Mail Company refused to do so.

The subsidy would give the Pacific Mail Company, for each of the thirteen trips made during the year, a greater price than is paid the other company for the entire yearly service. Thus the Pacific Mail Company would be awarded thirteen times for the breach of obligation to the Government what the other company has been allowed for rendering faithful service, and the latter deprived of its privilege of mail carriage. The Occidental and Oriental Company is, in fact, I am credibly informed, at least as much owned by Americans as the Pacific Mail Company, but it possesses only one American-built ship.

The tabulations which Mr. Bell has made for me show that the entire $800,000 would be exhausted, and more than exhausted, at the proposed rate of 50 cents per mile per trip both ways without adding a trip to those which were made during the last fiscal year, and hence exclude a reasonable expectation of better service.

The totality of the subsidy involved is at least $2,400,000, and possibly $4,000,000, accordingly as the proposed contracts shall be limited to three or extended to five years.

II. Another feature of this proposed enactment deserving particular attention is the effect which it would have in preventing an extension of ship-building. It is obvious that if one line of vessels shall receive on every trip a bounty of 50 cents per mile sailed, amounting to some thousands of dollars on every voyage, such a line will possess advantages which will enable it to defy competition, should any other persons have the temerity to attempt to enter the field against it. So far, therefore, from its being in the interest of new ships, the effect of it will be to deter the building of American ships. The only way to obviate this would be to extend the proffer of 50 cents a mile to any American ship which should enter upon the traffic between the United States and any of the countries to which such lines should be subsidized.

This, indeed, would become necessary to the postal service as well as to the interests of shipping extension, because only by provisions of that kind could there be any enlargement of the postal facilities for the full term for which the contracts should be made, and the Department would otherwise be denied opportunity to use any increased facilities for the transportation of the mails. In a word, contracts made under this subsidy will be fetters upon an extension for a term of years.

III. The last sentence but one of the amendment proposed, will operate to practically destroy opportunity for negotiation on the part of the Department. It provides that the Postmaster-General shall "so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places, respectively, in American vessels and for a reasonable compensation not exceeding the rate aforementioned." Inasmuch as there exists but one line of American vessels to each of the countries named, with the single exception this will leave it in the power of the companies to dictate their terms to the Department, being secure under the enactment of carrying the mails, and therefore able to insist upon the full measure of compensation proposed.

This also removes possibility of substantial gain of service indicated as the reason for large appropriation by the beginning of the enactment, that the large appropriation is designed "to secure the greater frequency and regularity in the dispatch and greater speed in the carriage of such mails." Inasmuch as the only existing American line on the route, in each case, will have the legal right to require mails to be transported by its vessels, it can refuse a contract except for the highest sum named and without any increased performance of service, either in frequency, regularity, or speed, which the Department might desire.

In short, the law might as well proffer 50 cents a mile to each of the American companies direct, and simply add a requirement that they should take such United States mails as the Department should tender for transportation.

Some of the vessels employed in at least one of the lines of American steamship companies are of foreign build, and to that extent the services of those companies, it may be anticipated, will be limited instead of increased.

IV. The clause which has just been mentioned also contains another peculiar feature. It requires the Department to procure and pay for the transportation of mails from the several foreign countries to the United States. The Postal Union convention, of which all of the countries except those in Australia are members, requires every government to provide only for the dispatch from its own shores of the foreign mails. This act proposes that the United States, in violation of the treaty obligation, shall assume the performance of the duty of these governments in regard to sending their own mails.

Most of the companies which would be beneficiaries of this amendment now receive from those governments liberal payments for the carriage of the mails, which the amendment would require the United States to provide for.

V. The provision in the last sentence that mail contracts shall be made from the ports of New York and New Orleans respectively to the Empire of Brazil must necessarily prove inoperative, because the appropriation of $800,000 will be inadequate to do more than give gratuities to existing lines. It is somewhat doubtful if it be sufficient to provide all of the existing lines at the price indicated, since it may be assumed that they will all stand for the full 50 cents a mile, being in no wise restricted in their possible demands, and little or nothing being left to the discretion of the Department.

VI. The inequality, and consequent unfairness, between carriers of paying for mail service by the mile sailed, without reference to the character of the ship or the character of the service, is also a feature of this amendment apparent without discussion. There is nothing, in short, which makes it more practicable and useful than the provision in the last annual appropriation bill, except that sufficient or nearly sufficient money is provided to enable all American carriers now under employment or upon the sea which will be necessary to be employed to have the full rate proposed.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF FOREIGN MAILS,
Washington, D. C., May 10, 1886.

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, I have the honor to furnish the following items of information relative to the conveyance of United States mails during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, by American lines of steamers subsidized by foreign governments; to mails dispatched to Japan and China by vessels of the Occidental and Oriental line, since August 1, 1885; and to New Zealand and Australia by the Oceanic Steamship Company, under a contract with the New Zealand Government, dated November 21, 1885.

MAILS FOR MEXICO.

I. New York, Havana and Mexican line: Nine vessels—five foreign registry, four American.

Article IV of its contract with the Mexican Government, of January 8, 1878, extended to September 1, 1886, requires that—

"All letters, official documents, and other packages dispatched by the administration of posts for the ports at which the steamers are obliged to call both going and coming will be transported free by the company during the period it enjoys the subsidy."

Article VII of postal convention between the United States and Mexico, of December 11, 1861, provides that—

"The United Mexican States engage to grant to the United States of America the transit, in closed mails, free from any postage duties, imposts, detention, or examination whatever, through the United Mexican States, or any of their possessions or territories, of letters, newspapers, printed pamphlets, or other printed matter, forwarded from the United States of America, or any of their possessions or territories, to any other possession or territory of the United States of America, or to any foreign country, or from any foreign country or possession or territory of the United States of America to the United States of America, their possessions or territories. A mail agent of the United States of America shall be permitted to accompany the closed mails in their transit."

Extracts from letter of the Mexican secretary of the interior, dated August 18, 1885, addressed to the director-general of posts of Mexico, and by him transmitted to this Department:

"It is stated in the contracts made with these companies (New York, Havana and Mexican; Pacific Mail Steamship Company; and California and Mexican) that they are obliged to convey, both going and coming, the official and public correspondence.

* * * * * * *

"Virtually the steamer may be considered as a traveling officer of the Mexican post-office, whose services other countries of the union may employ by paying to the Mexican post-office the transit expenses, in accordance with Articles III and IV of the Paris convention."

Article III, paragraph 2, of the Paris convention:

"Unless there be a contrary arrangement the direct sea-conveyance performed between two countries by means of packets or vessels depending upon one of them shall be considered as a third service; and such conveyance, as well as any performed between two offices of the same country, by the intermediary of maritime or territorial services maintained by another country, is regulated by the stipulations of the following article."

Article IV fixes the rate of sea transit for such service at "5 francs (96.5 cents) per kilogram (2.205 pounds) of letters and post-cards, and 50 centimes per kilogram (about 4½ cents a pound) for other articles."

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company has contracts with the Governments of Guatemala and Costa Rica for the conveyance of mails between San Francisco and Panama, and is paid by each of these governments at the rate of $2,000 per month; but copies of the contracts have not been furnished this Department, and consequently their terms are not known.

MAILS FOR NEW ZEALAND.

VI. Extract from letter of postmaster-general of New Zealand, dated Wellington, February 26, 1886:

"I forward copy of contract with Union Steamship Company, of New Zealand, for the performance of a 'four-weekly' mail service (thirteen round trips annually) between Sydney, Auckland, Honolulu, and San Francisco, for a period of three years from the 21st November last, and to draw your special attention to clauses 10 and 11:

"'Clause 10. The payment for all the services mentioned in this contract shall be £30,000 sterling per annum, less the deduction next hereinafter mentioned, namely: The Postmaster-General of the United States has agreed by cablegram to pay £4,000 toward the services herein provided, unless Congress forbids, and, if such payment shall be made, two-thirds of the said sum of £4,000 shall be deducted from the total payment of £30,000.

"'The contractors shall collect the said £4,000, and account as aforesaid to the Postmaster-General for two-thirds of that sum, which sum shall be equally divided between the postmasters-general. If the Postmaster-General of the United States is prevented by Congress from paying the £4,000, then the postmaster-general shall make up the payment to the £30,000 aforesaid in the proportion of £20,000 by the postmaster-general of New Zealand to £10,000 to the postmaster-general of New South Wales.

"'Clause 11. Ten thousand pounds of the total sum payable under this contract shall be paid by the postmaster-general of New South Wales, and £20,000 shall be paid by the postmaster-general of New Zealand; but from such payments there shall be deducted by each of the postmasters-general, respectively, an amount equal to one-third of the £4,000 agreed to be paid by the Postmaster-General of the United States as aforesaid.'"

The service to be performed exclusively by the Oceanic Steamship Company, during the next three years between San Francisco and the Hawaiian Kingdom, under the contract between the New Zealand Government and the Union Steamship Company, for the conveyance of mails between New Zealand and the United States, was performed during the year ended June 30, 1885, by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and Oceanic Steamship Company jointly, the details of which during the last fiscal year were as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF FOREIGN MAILS,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to your verbal request I have the honor to inform you that the total amount that would go to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company under the Senate amendment would be a little in excess of $325,000, or $262,000 more that the sea and inland postage, or $325,000 more than the sea postage that was paid to said company for the same service during the last fiscal year ended June 30, 1885.

I inclose herewith a letter of the honorable Postmaster-General dated May 12, and the letter of this office of May 10, No. 71967, which were left at my office this morning.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, if there be no objection, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Georgia be extended.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I should like very much to have further time, but I do not think it would be courteous to other gentlemen, because I propose to limit the debate, and looking to that end, I now move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting general debate on this amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I trust that by unanimous consent the chairman of the committee may be allowed additional time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I shall not ask a privilege for myself that I can not afford to ask for others. I believe that two days will be ample for general debate. I propose to ask for that, nothing more and nothing less, and in so doing I am acting under the instructions of my committee and deferring to a sentiment in this House that the public time should not be uselessly occupied.

Mr. BURROWS. I trust that the chairman of the committee will not make the motion to rise at this time, just at the close of his address, thus disturbing the impression which he has made.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suppose three minutes will answer the purpose, and I trust that I have made impression enough to last that long. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. If the Chair will bear with me for a moment, I wish to say that I was not at the meeting of the committee this morning and did not understand, what I now learn, that it was agreed in the committee that general debate should be limited as proposed by the chairman. I now withdraw my objection and desire that the debate may be limited by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee determines to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Senate amendments to the Post-Office appropriation bill, and pending that, I move that general debate on the same be limited to this day and to-morrow.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose it is the intention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to move to go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. After the first morning hour. The Chair has held that it requires unanimous consent to dispense with that hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that it is in order, under the rule, at any time after the expiration of the morning hour, which is the hour for the call of committees, to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider general appropriation bills or revenue bills.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is what I propose to do.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT to limit general debate was agreed to; also the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The House accordingly again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, the Post-Office appropriation bill, having passed the House, comes back to us from the Senate with several amendments, only one of which will provoke any considerable discussion. That is the amendment numbered 6, which provides an appropriation of $800,000 to support the carrying of our foreign mails to Central and South America, China, Japan, and Australia.

The carrying of the mails is a governmental obligation. The establishment of post-offices and post-roads is a duty imposed upon the National Government by the national Constitution. The carrying of the mails to these post-offices over established post-routes is enjoined by legislative mandate. In the execution of this obligation the National Government expended for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, in carrying the domestic mail above twenty-three and a half million dollars. Of this sum over sixteen and a half millions were paid to the railways of the country. We paid to the star-route service throughout the country about five and a half millions. We paid for our steamboat service, coastwise and inland, over half a million—$563,000. We paid for the messenger service, carrying the mails from the depots to the post-offices, $879,217.

While we make this liberal appropriation for the carrying of the domestic mail, we appropriated last year for our entire foreign service over both oceans, through the Gulf, and over the Caribbean Sea to the South American countries, the sum of $326,735—a trifle over one-fifth of the amount we appropriated to the domestic messenger service. This was the sum total of our foreign appropriation. This paucity of compensation is no fault of the Postmaster-General; it is no fault of any Government officer; but it arises from the law. For instance, the railway service, for which we paid, as I have said, sixteen and one-half millions last year, is contracted for, not by advertisement; but under certain limitations the Postmaster-General is authorized to contract for that service.

The star-route service, for which we pay five and one-half millions, is let to the lowest responsible bidder, and if there are no competing bids upon any competing route the route is let to the single bidder, whoever he be, if the price be reasonable; in other words, the letting of this service is lodged with the Postmaster-General, to be contracted for to the lowest responsible bidder after due advertisement.

The coastwise service and the river service on our steamboats is not even let to the lowest responsible bidder; but the Postmaster-General is authorized to contract for this service upon his own judgment, and an appropriation is made to enable him to make contracts to carry out this service along our coast and over our rivers. For that service we paid over half a million last year.

But when you come to the foreign service, sections 4007 and 4009 of the Revised Statutes limit the amount of compensation; for instance, the former section (4007) gives the Postmaster-General authority to contract for the foreign service.

But section 4009 restricts him in the payment of compensation by saying that when the mails are carried on an American steamship he may pay the postage of the mail carried; but if carried on a foreign vessel or a sailing vessel he shall pay the sea postage only, which is the difference between the whole postage and the inland postage. So, under the operation of that law, which restricts the Postmaster-General to this rule of compensation, this great injustice arises.

To illustrate: We paid last year for carrying the mails from Tampa, Fla., to Key West, a coastwise service of 249 miles, $23,600. We took that same mail and carried it from Key West to Cuba, about 100 miles, and that, being foreign service, could be paid only the sea and inland postage at most. It was paid the sea postage—about $237—$23,600 from Tampa to Key West and $237 from Key West to Havana. Why? Because the law permits the Postmaster-General to contract for coastwise service, while the provisions of law restrict him in the matter of compensation for the foreign service to the sea postage if it is a foreign vessel, or the sea and inland postage if it be a domestic vessel.

Now as a result of this the amount expended for our whole foreign service, as I have said, was limited during the last year to the sum of about $326,000. But the shameful part of this matter is that of this $326,000, $280,000 went into the pockets of foreign ship-owners and only $46,000 to our own vessels, for the whole mail service across the Atlantic is carried in foreign bottoms under foreign flags. They readily take our mails for the sea postage, and this law has driven American mails from American ships.

The Post-Office appropriation bill, as it went from the House, continued this old method of compensation, giving to American lines at most only the sea and inland postage. It comes back to us authorizing the Postmaster-General to do with this foreign service precisely what is done with the domestic service, with the mail carried on star routes and on steamboats. It authorizes him to contract for this service to the lowest responsible bidder sailing an American craft and flying the American flag. This whole talk of "subsidy" and "bounty" is simply to excite the prejudices of this House, instead of appealing to the judgment of reasonable men.

The only practical question then is, will you appropriate $800,000—less than you pay for the domestic messenger service—for the support of your foreign mail service? To this measure, for myself, I give my most earnest and cordial support.

The chairman of the committee, in commenting on this provision, says that by its terms it will allow no increase of service; that the whole $800,000 will go to existing lines between their present terminal points, and there will be no opportunity under this provision for the Postmaster-General to either increase the service or put on new lines.

The chairman was not unaware of the fact that in committee I offered an amendment to this provision, which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to be read, and when the proper time arrives I will move to concur in this amendment with the following proviso.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That not exceeding $400,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended in payment of existing American steamship lines for the transportation of foreign mails according to the schedules heretofore in force; and that so much of the balance as may be required shall be expended in increasing the frequency of the postal service of such steamship lines and in the establishment of postal service by American built and registered steamships between the United States and such ports of the foreign countries herein named, not now connected with the United States by American steamship lines, as the Postmaster-General may select, including Buenos Ayres and Montevideo.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed by this amendment, upon which I shall ask a vote in committee, that only $400,000 of this $800,000 is to be used for existing lines between their present terminal points, and the balance of the $800,000 may be used by the Postmaster-General for the extension of present lines or to establish new lines to new ports.

The question then is, is this $800,000 or $400,000 too much for our whole foreign service?

To the New York and Brazilian line, the only line we have running to Brazil, we paid last year $4,210, and the distance it had to go on a single trip was 5,154 miles, or in a round trip more than 10,000 miles. To Rio and return we paid this line the sum of $4,210 for the year, or $326 a trip, or about 3 cents a mile, while at the same time we paid for 246 miles from Tampa to Key West $23,600, or 46 cents a mile. Upon what principle of justice or of reason is this distinction made?

The "Red D line," to which the gentleman referred, the only line running from New York to Venezuela, the only steamship flying the American flag in that country, sailed to reach the ports of Venezuela 3,066 miles, in each round trip 6,132 miles, and received—how much?—$56.53 a trip, stopping at eight ports, and paid out more to deliver the mail than they received from the Government of the United States.

At the same time we paid the steamship for carrying the mails from Norfolk to Baltimore, but 200 miles, the sum of $18,000—more than 15 cents a mile!

To the New York and Cuban line, running from New York to Cuba, 1,174 miles, we paid a little over $2,600. That line made seventy-one trips, sailing a total distance of 166,608 miles. And how much did we pay a mile to that line? One cent and a half for carrying the United States mail. At the same time a steamer running from Norfolk to Cape Charles, 38 miles of coastwise service, for that 38 miles received $10,971, or over 39 cents a mile. A cent and a half from New York to Cuba, 1,174 miles, and 40 cents a mile from Norfolk to Cape Charles, 38 miles! We paid the New Orleans and Central American line, running from New Orleans to Nicaragua, 1,065 miles' distance, making fifteen trips, traveling in the year 40,500 miles—we paid for that service, for carrying the United States mail, going to the post-office in the United States and getting the mail, taking it to the boat, and delivering it to the post-office in the foreign country, the magnificent sum of $24.50. It is proposed now to pay this line a reasonable compensation for that service, and it is denominated a subsidy!

At the same time while we paid this line the sum of $24.50 we paid another line, running from New Orleans to Port Eads, $22,719. The Clyde line, which runs from New York to Hayti, 1,315 miles, seventeen trips (44,710 miles a year), was paid for that service $553.66 for a year, a cent and one-fifth per mile. At the same time we paid from Memphis to Arkansas City, only 216 miles, $24,000. Upon what principle do we pay only one cent and a half a mile from New York to Hayti and 33½ cents a mile from Memphis to Arkansas City. From New Orleans to Honduras, a service of 1,060 miles, we paid last year the sum of $38.91; for carrying the United States mail from New Orleans to Grand Isle we paid $3,950. We paid more last year from Tampa to Key West, 246 miles, than we paid the American lines for the whole Gulf service, South Atlantic and transatlantic service, and the service to Mexico, Central and South America, and Europe.

Let us look now at the other side of the South American country. From San Francisco to Hong-Kong, 6,080 miles distant, we paid $3,506 for last year's service, eighteen trips, each trip 12,180 miles, the total distance sailed nearly 220,000 miles, and we paid 1½ cents a mile for that foreign service. At the same time another boat starts from San Francisco and goes to Eureka, on the coast, only 216 miles distant, and we paid that line $6,500. Why pay for a trip of 12,000 miles $195 and a trip of 432 miles $125?

From San Francisco to Panama, a distance of 2,539 miles, we paid $1,238. The total number of trips was twenty-five, each trip more than 5,000 miles, and we paid to that line for each trip $49.53, or about 9 mills per mile.

At the same time we paid another line running from Tacoma to Port Townsend, 98 miles $29,700, or 48 cents a mile. Why pay 9 mills for a trip of 5,000 miles and 48 cents for a trip of 95 miles? The California and Mexican Steamship Company, running from San Francisco to Mexico, 1,520 miles, sailing during the year more than 36,000 miles, was paid $208.82, while at the same time we paid from Port Townsend to Neah Bay, 102 miles, $6,303.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is there any explanation for this astounding statement of difference you make by reason of the quantity of work done or amount of mail handled?

Mr. BURROWS. No, sir, there is not; and it may be said further that domestic lines can stop along the coast or at cities on our rivers and trade at different towns all along the line, while the foreign ship after it puts to sea has no way business en route to its foreign destination.

Mr. GOFF. And that is in the interest of the home service, which makes it worse yet.

Mr. BURROWS. If there is any service that ought to be paid well it is that upon the ocean, which can draw nothing from local trade.

We paid more for carrying the mails from San Francisco to Sacramento, 171 miles, to wit, $6,000, than we paid the American line from San Francisco to Hong-Kong, Panama, and to Mexico. We paid $6,000 more for carrying the mails from Tacoma to Port Townsend, a distance of 98 miles, than we paid the whole foreign Pacific mail service. We paid as much from Tacoma to Sitka, 1,441 miles, to wit, $47,700, than to all the American lines to foreign ports across both oceans. And yet no man charges that the compensation from Tacoma to Sitka is a subsidy. I have alluded to these facts for the purpose of showing how unjustly the law of sea and inland postage operates. It is not the fault of any executive officer, it is simply because the law declares that you shall pay to a foreign vessel only the sea and inland postage if it is flying an American flag from an American ship; and there is nothing under the sun in the amendment of the Senate but the mere saying to the Postmaster-General "you shall have the same authority to contract for the foreign service as you now have to contract for domestic service," and makes an appropriation to carry these contracts out.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman another question, if I do not disturb him.

Mr. BURROWS. It does not disturb me, but my time is limited and I have a great deal that I desire to present to the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It is claimed by some that these foreign vessels only carry sometimes ten or twelve letters on these long trips, while the shorter routes carry immense quantities of mail. Now, in line with the question before asked, I would like to inquire (to have some light thrown upon that point) if it is the quantity handled or the weight of the mails which has such a material effect in creating the difference to which you allude.

Mr. BURROWS. The amount handled does not enter into the computation at all. That, of course, is considered in the railway mail service; but in the star-route service it is not considered.

Mr. GUENTHER. It is not weighed.

Mr. BURROWS. The mails are not weighed except on the railroads; but when they are to be carried over a star route the law is that the service shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, and steamboats carrying the domestic mail enter into contracts for this service without regard to weight, simply receiving it in pouches and throwing it off at the port of destination; but the weight of the mail on star-route and coastwise lines does not enter into the question of compensation to any considerable extent, and the quantity of mail should not govern in compensating for the foreign service for the reason that it is just as much labor to go from the wharf in New York city to the post-office, as the master of the ship is compelled to do, to get the mail where it fills one bag as it would if it filled five or fifty bags.

When the steamship company receive the mail for foreign transportation the delivery of it is attended with the same expense whether it is five bags or fifty. At some of the ports in South America, in Venezuela or Brazil, the mails have to be taken on a tug and carried to the landing, and then carried to the post-office. They are not delivered at the wharf. And it makes no difference in the expense in hiring that tug, which the steamship companies must now do—paying at one place as I remember $15—whether they take one mail-bag or fifty.

Mr. GUENTHER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GUENTHER. But the fact remains that the carrying of foreign mails is paid by weight. These astounding figures are not on the proper basis.

Mr. BURROWS. The carrying of the foreign mail is paid, as I have stated, according to the postage on that mail, and nothing more.

Mr. GUENTHER. Based on weight.

Mr. BURROWS. On the postage, which is, of course, based on weight—so much on every half-ounce; 5 cents, for instance, from New York to Rio; and the Government says to the American steamship company carrying the American flag, "If you carry that letter from New York to Rio we will divide the postage; we will give you 3 cents and take 2; that is, we will take the domestic and give you the sea postage; or, if we incline to generosity, we are permitted to give you the whole postage, 5 cents." And if this line running to Rio, which might extend its line to the Plata, to Buenos Ayres, and the Argentine Republic, we say to it, "Push ahead; and if you go down and open that country and carry fifty letters, we will pay you $2.50."

Mr. GUENTHER. I wish to ask the gentleman, then, whether he puts this appropriation on the ground of extending our commerce?

Mr. BURROWS. I will come to that presently.

Mr. GUENTHER. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BURROWS. The Government says to the Brazilian Steamship Company, "If you will push 1,500 miles farther along, and strike the great city of Buenos Ayres, with its population of 500,000, and carry the flag to the borders of the Argentine Republic, we will pay you the sea and inland postage on the mails carried," and that is all the Postmaster-General can pay under the law.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is there any other mail service except the foreign mail that is compensated on the basis of the postage—on the earnings of the mail service to the Government?

Mr. BURROWS. None other. We carry the mail to the distant frontier, if there be but a single man. My friend from Wisconsin made a suggestion about our foreign commerce. I suppose the mail is carried to the frontiersman not because he expects to remain there but a day and then return but because he has located there, and in the track of the mail line will follow the tide of immigration, which will contribute to the establishment of new homes and cities, the development of the country, and in the end contribute to the general weal.

In other days other men were not afraid to champion a proposition like this. Other men were not afraid to pay reasonable compensation to American lines for carrying the foreign mails. In other days this subject commanded the thoughtful consideration and earnest speech of American statesmen and was a matter of national solicitude.

Mr. Bayard, the illustrious father of the no less illustrious present Secretary of State, said:

> The mail service in this and all countries on land is a government duty; and with all great maritime nations which have the power to control that service on the ocean it is as much a government duty where their extensive commerce is concerned as is on land the proper transportation of correspondence. The mail service with foreign countries on any principle that I can appreciate is as much a governmental duty and demands as much the expenditure and the attention of the Government as transportation of correspondence in the interior of the country. Will you—

Senator Bayard said—> adopt a policy which will place the entire transportation of your mails under British control—

That is what you have done—

> which will put into their hands the transportation of passengers, which will lay a tax on American citizens for the advancement of British commerce? Such may be the judgment of the honorable Senator, but it is not mine, and I trust it will not be that of the American Senate.

Thomas Butler King, speaking on this same subject, said:

> If it be asked why Great Britain has thus taken the lead of us in ocean steam navigation, while we are so clearly superior in domestic steamers and sailing ships, the answer is she has anticipated us through the extension of her mail system to foreign countries in combination with naval arrangements.

James K. Polk once said this:

> It is strange, sir, that men who are presumed to embody the wisdom of the land should have to be reminded that they are pandering to British power, forgetting American interests, and losing sight of that greatness and grandeur which attach to this American Government.

I stand upon the floor of the American Congress and I find men who are willing to measure our greatness by the circumference of a dollar—a dollar, sir!—measure American prosperity and American greatness by a round dollar, and thus pander to British interests, bow the pliant knee, and say to the power that assailed us at Lexington, that flashed the first guns from Bunker Hill, that fought us upon the sea and land in 1812, and that has been jealous of our prosperity and our greatness ever since—say to her, "Good mother, won't you please carry our mails?" Why, sir, I scorn, I despise that anti-American feeling and sentiment. The men who stand battling upon these principles are behind the age; they are behind the progress of their country; they know nothing of its power or its influence and are contributing to a combination of foreign policy designed to overslaugh us.

How prophetic the words of Bayard which I have quoted! To-day, as I have said, of the $326,000 paid for carrying our foreign mails $280,000 is paid to the owners of foreign vessels, and not a single American line crossing the Atlantic carries the American mails.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have not discussed what I intended when I arose. It was my purpose to call the attention of this committee to the advantage which would result to the nation in carrying our mails to the South American countries, as this bill proposes, in American steamships.

We can not and we must not lose sight of the advantage of connecting this country with the South American republics. The carrying of a single letter to Chili or to the Argentine Republic may lay the foundation of a trade of inestimable value, not to these steamship companies, but to all the American people. Our diversified industries are capable of giving employment to all our laboring people. The field and the factory, the forest and the mine, our facilities for employing labor, are simply boundless, and yet to-day a million of our laboring people are out of employment and the bloody hand of the communist is clutching at the throat of capital.

We might give employment to this labor if we would. But if we employ this labor and light the fires of our furnaces and open the mines and set the looms in motion, where shall we dispose of the products? Why, at our very door is the answer. We have the market at hand if we are wise enough to control it. Within a stone's throw almost, right south of us, is the Republic of Mexico, with its twenty-seven States, with a government patterned after our own, with ten millions and a half of people. Her imports last year were more than $35,000,000; her exports were more than $46,000,000; her entire trade aggregating more than $82,000,000.

Who controls the trade of Mexico, lying right upon our border? Why, sir, Spain took over twenty-six millions of it, Germany over eighteen millions and a half, France nearly sixteen millions, while the United States controlled less than ten millions; England took nine millions, and the Central American countries two and a half millions. So that of this entire trade with Mexico the United States controlled but a trifle over one-tenth, while nine-tenths of it was held by foreign countries.

Take Central America, with its five republics. Those five Central American republics have more trade with England by far—yes, double the trade—than they have with the United States, although they lie at our very doors, easily accessible from the ports of the Gulf States. Their principal imports are cotton goods. We could furnish every yard of cotton goods that the Central American countries need, but Great Britain in 1880 sold them 31,000,000 yards, while the United States sold them only 688,000 yards—a little over half a million. The balance of trade with Mexico in 1884 was against us by over $3,000,000. The import trade of Central America has increased rapidly in the last fifteen years. In 1870 it was only $730,000; in 1884 it was $6,500,000.

In 1883 the United States sold the Central American countries manufactured goods amounting to less that $2,000,000, while Great Britain sold them over three and a half million dollars. Of cotton goods the United States sold them $124,000 worth, while Great Britain sold them $2,500,000 worth. The United States sold them only $4,000 worth of candles, Great Britain $13,000 worth. We sold them $16,000 worth of china and glassware, Great Britain $28,000 worth. Of wearing apparel the United States sold them but $24,000 worth, England $148,000 worth. Of iron and steel we sold them $300,000 worth, while England sold them $500,000 worth. Of wood manufactures we sold Central America but $4,000 worth, England $121,000 worth. And in the last twenty years our entire trade with the Central American countries, so far as exports are concerned, has amounted to only sixteen millions, while that of Great Britain alone has been more than $46,000,000, and with France more than ten millions and a half.

Why, sir, look at these countries south of us—Mexico, Central and South America, embracing within their confines forty-three million people substantially without manufactures—fifteen republics, fashioned after our own, and the great Empire of Brazil. I have referred to the commerce of Central America alone. Take the commerce of Central and South American countries together. The total foreign commerce of Central and South America is $850,000,000 annually, and their imports alone from Europe and the United States aggregate in value $420,000,000 annually. These countries buy of foreign countries $420,000,000 worth of commodities. Of that total foreign trade of $850,000,000 how much does the United States control? One hundred and thirty million dollars, while Europe controls $720,000,000. Of her $420,000,000 imports, they bought of the United States only $40,000,000—one-tenth—the balance, $380,000,000, was purchased of foreign countries other than our own; yet all she consumes we can produce. Of the $800,000,000 merchandise exported last year from the United States less than 7 per cent. went to Central and South America.

Why, sir, South America imports annually enormous quantities of coal. How much from the United States? None; she brings it from England. Yet our coal mines are running on half time or closed up altogether. Mexico and Central and South America consume annually about $100,000,000 worth of cotton goods. How much do they buy of Great Britain? Ninety-five per cent., and the other 5 per cent. we share in simply. There is no reason why we should not furnish all her cotton fabrics, and these constitute the wearing apparel of three-fourth of her people.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And yet we can furnish coarse cotton goods more cheaply than Great Britain.

Mr. BURROWS. Iron and steel those countries buy of Europe by millions, while our mills are shut down. What is the reason of this? What is the trouble?

Why, sir, to those South American countries we have two lines of steamers—only two. We have one line, the Red D line, running from New York to Venezuela, and another line running from New York and Newport News to Brazil. Outside of these lines there is not a single American steamer entering a port of the South American countries or flying an American flag. The Brazilian line has three steamers, every one of them American built; the Venezuelan line seven, all of American construction. We thus have ten steamers on two lines running to Venezuela and Brazil, the only two countries of all the South American republics to which our steamers run. And for the mail service to these two countries we paid last year the magnificent sum of $5,603.08. At the same time we paid from Tampa to Key West $23,600; we paid to the Pacific Mail Steamship line, from New York to Colon and from San Francisco to Panama, $8,817; we paid the New Orleans and Central American line, $24.50; Oteri's Pioneer line, from New Orleans to Honduras, $81.38; the Royal Mail line, from New Orleans to Honduras, $509; the New Orleans, Honduras and Guatemala line, $35.91; and the Kate Currell, from New Orleans to Honduras, $1.17. The aggregate amount paid for carrying the mails to Central and South America was $15,136.16, about the same sum we paid from Louisville, Ky., to Evansville, Ind. This is the extent and amount of compensation paid American steamships for carrying our mails to Central and South America; and if you want to reach any other country in South America to-day aside from Venezuela and Brazil you must take passage to England and under a foreign flag reach the Argentine Republic, her capital city of Buenos Ayres, Uruguay, Chili, or any other of the great eastern or western republics of South America.

Now, what have foreign countries been doing and what are they still doing to sustain their foreign-mail service with these countries? In showing what Germany, France, Great Britain, and other foreign countries pay for their foreign service I restrict my statements to Central and South America. In the winter of 1884–'85 Mr. Frelinghuysen, then Secretary of State, requested the various legations in Europe to advise him as to the amount of aid granted by the governments of those countries to encourage commerce between their ports and Central and South America. Mr. Lowell, our minister to England, inclosed in reply the following communication from the English premier:

FOREIGN OFFICE, January 24, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you the accompanying statement, which her majesty's postmaster has caused to be prepared, giving the information, so far as the records of the general post-office extend, namely, from the year 1861 to the present date, in regard to the aid granted by Her Majesty's Government toward the establishment of direct steamship communication between this country and Central and South America.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

GRANVILLE.

The following is the statement:

1862	£294,243	1874	£248,697
1863	294,243	1875	249,018
1864	294,243	1876	139,652
1865	231,414	1877	130,499
1866	226,914	1878	123,084
1867	225,104	1879	116,306
1868	229,972	1880	95,367
1869	229,519	1881	99,355
1870	241,459	1882	96,614
1871	247,624	1883	96,785
1872	250,568	1884	95,560
1873	253,352

From the foregoing it appears that, commencing in 1862, the English post-office department paid £294,000 to establish mail steamship communication with Central and South America, and that rate continued from year to year until 1884, when the British Government paid £95,000 for mail service between her ports and Central and South America. Nearly $1,500,000 in 1862, continuing until the close of our civil war, and in 1884 $500,000 were paid by that country to connect her ports with Central and South America. In twenty-two years she paid for this service twenty-two and one-half millions of dollars, and she is still expending half a million dollars every year to hold this trade. She pays the Royal Mail line for nine steamers to Rio, fourteen steamers to Central America and the countries of the Caribbean Sea $432,000. At the same time, the United States in twenty-two years has expended for her mail service to Central and South America only $350,000.

Our minister to France replied by saying that in 1884 France paid her South American line $728,000 and her West India and Central American lines $790,000, a total of $1,518,000, while the United States paid $15,000.

Mr. Dayton, our minister to the Hague, replied that the Royal West India mail steamers are paid $3,000 a round trip for a weekly service between its ports and the ports of the West Indies and Central and South America—$156,000 a year. The United States paid for similar service $15,000.

Austria-Hungary pays the Lloyd Steamship Company, for each trip to Central and South America, 4,000 florins. The Spanish line of steamships to the West Indies receive annually $350,000 from that government—more than the United States paid for her entire foreign service. Belgium pays a line of steamers between Antwerp and the ports of Rio, Buenos Ayres, and Montevideo, the whole postal revenues of the mail carried, whether originating in or destined to Belgium, and $100,000 annually besides.

Mr. Kasson, minister to Berlin, in his reply said:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, Berlin, March 30, 1885.

SIR: Inclosed herewith I transmit a copy of the law recently passed by the Reichstag granting subsidies for the establishment of three new steamship lines for the further development of German commerce and German interests in foreign countries, with translation of the same.

The contract is made for fifteen years, the annual amount for the first two lines being 4,000,000 marks, and for the tributary lines 1,000.

The determined resolution of the chancellor to provide this new opening to market for the surplus manufactures of Germany, to open new spheres of employment to the enterprising German people, and to increase the influence of Germany in the world, enforced by his powerful and patriotic arguments in Parliament, carried the day over the combination of opposing parties. Happy country, whose intelligent and patriotic statesmanship is not howled down by the demagogue's cry of "jobbery."

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN A. KASSON.

The foregoing is sufficient to give some idea what foreign governments are doing to secure and hold the trade of Central and South America.

I have referred to the importance of this trade in a general way; let me take it up somewhat more in detail.

Take the Republic of Venezuela, with her population of 2,000,000 of people. Our exports of manufactured goods are small. In 1883 we sold her of cotton goods $214,000 worth, while England sold her $1,500,000 worth.

We sold her of chemicals $107,000 worth, $278,000 of iron and steel, $77,000 of petroleum, and $75,000 of furniture.

France sold her of leather goods, boots and shoes, $70,000 worth, and the United States, with her great factories, sold the people of Venezuela only $1,700 worth.

The establishment of the Red D line has opened that country to us and done much to increase our trade. In 1870 our imports from Venezuela were two millions, in 1884 they were six millions and a half. Our exports in 1870 were $866,000; in 1884 two millions. In 1870 we imported 11,000,000 pounds of coffee; in 1884 53,000,000 of pounds. In 1870 we shipped to her $15,000 worth of furniture; in 1884 $80,000 worth. In 1870 we bought of her $440,000 worth of hides; in 1880 $1,052,000 worth. In 1870 we sold her $23,000 worth of oil, and in 1880 $82,000 worth. This gives some slight idea of what the Red D line has accomplished. Yet of the entire import trade of Venezuela England to-day controls one-half of it, and the United States a little less than one-third.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MILLARD. I will take the floor, Mr. Chairman, and yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. For how long?

Mr. MILLARD. As long as he wishes.

Mr. BURROWS. I will conclude in a few minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the Red D line has advanced our interests with this country, and yet it has but seven vessels. It made thirty-four trips last year, sailing 6,000 miles each trip; yet we paid that line only $1,300, while at the same time we paid to the steamer running from Brunswick to Simon's Mills, in your State of Georgia, Mr. Chairman, 12 miles, $1,000, and we pay only $1,300 to this Venezuelan line.

The United States of Colombia, how about our trade with her? Not a solitary American steamship entering her port, yet her trade is great. England sells her annually three and a half millions of cotton goods, while the United States only half a million. Of boots and shoes she bought of the United States $112,000 and of France $750,000. France sells her $828,000 worth of wearing apparel, while the United States sells her but $85,000. She imports annually $20,000,000 worth of manufactured products, every single article of which we produce in this country and might sell her, but we have not a single steamship connecting with her ports.

Go down to Peru, a country with three millions of people and institutions modeled after our own. She is practically without manufactories.

The United States sold Peru in 1882 of cotton goods only $42,000 worth, while Great Britain sold her $2,325,000. In 1882 we sold her of hardware—iron and steel—but $73,000 worth, while Great Britain sold her $811,000 worth.

Of the article of paper the United States sold $1,170 worth and Great Britain $16,000 worth. Of manufactured hemp the United States sold her $7,000, while Great Britain sold her $100,000. Of wearing apparel Great Britain sold her $58,000, France $178,000, and the United States not a dollar's worth. Of woolen goods she bought of England $481,000 worth, of France $719,000 worth, and of the United States not a dollar. Why is this? We have no communication with that country.

Look at the map before you and you will observe that there is not a line running from the United States down the western shore of South America. Now and then by a stray sailing vessel American goods reach her ports, but they are shipped generally to Liverpool and Hamburg and carried under a foreign flag around the Horn. The Royal Mail Steamship Company and French line monopolize this entire trade, and do it not by being paid the sea and inland postage, but are aided by liberal compensation for carrying the mails.

How easily the Pacific Steamship Company could extend her line from Panama down the western coast, but the United States says to her, "If you take that venture we will give you half the postage on the letters you carry, though these letters may lay the foundation for a great trade with the Republic of Peru."

Take Chili, with her population of two and one half-millions, and the trade with that country is enormous. I can not go into it at length, but she buys annually $35,000,000 worth of manufactured goods. Think of it; $35,000,000 annually! She has more trade per capita than France, twice as much foreign trade as Mexico, and four times as much as the whole of the Central American states.

Yet the United States has less than 4 per cent. of this trade; England, France, and Germany control more than 80 per cent. of her trade; and Great Britain alone takes more than 50 per cent. of it. In 1882 our trade was only $3,500,000 with Chili, while Great Britain's trade that very year was $73,000,000, and France and Germany $13,000,000. And yet we stand idly by and refuse to do anything to secure this trade, and when it is proposed to pay reasonable compensation to American lines if they will open communication with this country and thereby extend our communications through the instrumentality of a mail service we are met with the cry of "subsidy." Germany sold of sewing-machines—for they are not savages down there—in 1882 Germany sold of sewing-machines $109,000 and the United States $7,000.

Germany sold her of pianos $112,000 worth and the United States $7,000. Of cotton goods Germany sold $1,645,000 worth, and the United States $300,000 worth. Of boots and shoes Germany sold $234,000, and the United States sold none! In 1882 England sold $7,000,000 worth of cotton goods and one-half million dollars' worth of woolen goods and two millions of iron and steel, every single yard and pound of which could have been furnished by the looms, mines, and mills of the United States. From 1863 to 1882, in twenty years, England sold her $213,000,000 worth, France $135,000,000, and the United States $36,000,000.

In 1882 Chili bought $10,000,000 worth of cotton goods, only $300,000 of which came from the United States; $4,000,000 worth of woolen goods, $6,000 of it from United States; $319,000 worth of carpets, none from United States; $470,000 worth of silks, none from the United States; $1,289,000 grain and flour bags, $114 worth bought of the United States; she bought $722,000 worth of hats and caps, from the United States none; $1,261,000 furnishing goods, $125 of this came from the United States; she bought $400,000 worth of watches and jewelry, we sold her $21,000 of it; $428,000 worth of boots and shoes, $11,000 worth of which came from the United States; she bought $892,000 worth of glass and crockery, $15,000 of it from the United States; she bought $2,000,000 worth of hardware and cutlery, $200,000 of it came from the United States; $2,300,000 worth of iron, of which the United States sold her but $306; she bought $164,000 worth of watches, but no portion of them came from the United States. What is the trouble? Why this paucity of trade? Why, we have no communication with Chili! And when it is proposed to extend the steamship lines carrying American mails to that country by permitting the Postmaster-General to contract for this service the same as for the domestic service the cry of "subsidy" is raised.

In 1881, thirteen hundred and eighty, and in 1882, fifteen hundred and sixty, vessels entered the ports of Chili, more than twenty-five hundred craft in all. Four-fifths of them were under the English flag and not a single steamship from the United States carrying the American flag.

It is easy to extend our Pacific mail down the coast and touch at Chili, but the reply comes, "if you take the venture we will give you only 5 cents a letter for carrying American mails."

What does Chili say in her public press? And let me say right here that many of these foreign countries are anxious to establish mail communication with us. They never refer to us but as the "Great Republic," and they have standing offers of a hundred thousand dollars if we will do something to establish mail communication with them; but we have refused. When we try to do it we are met with the cry of subsidy.

I read from an article, an editorial, published in a Valparaiso paper, the Journal of Commerce, which will give you some idea of the thought of Chili upon this subject:

The political economists and manufacturers of the Grand Republic (as they call the United States) are beginning to realize the small amount of trade they do with the South American countries in comparison with England, France, and Germany. Without exaggeration we may say that these nations rule our market, and the commerce of the first named exceeds that of all the other nations of the Old and New World together, forming a painful contrast with the United States.

In the last twenty years, commencing from 1863, the exports from Germany to Chili have increased from $772,515 to $10,015,564, those from France from $4,301,858 to $8,935,309, and those from England from $4,090,069 to $31,638,000. From the United States they have decreased from $1,810,846 in 1863 to $1,774,645 in 1883. More notable still are the exports, for to Germany they increased from $684,596 to $4,811,438, to France from $1,649,364 to $6,208,927, to England from $12,313,029 to $58,961,622, but to the United States they only increased from $1,352,672 to $1,666,978.

We can therefore say that, should the commerce with the other nations continue in the same proportion, before twenty-five years shall have elapsed the products of the Grand Republic will be excluded from this coast, as the North American flag now is, being represented last year by only two steamers—vessels of war—in the presence of 10 Spanish, 12 Italian, 78 French, 100 German, 1,944 English steamers. The United States yields in nothing to other nations, neither in population, richness, nor industrial products. It rather surpasses them in most respects, and should have our trade by reason of its proximity and the international sympathy engendered by common institutions and aspirations. It is therefore a case which excites our curiosity, wounds our self-esteem, affects our commercial interests, and needs careful consideration and efficacious remedies.

The people of the United States no doubt believe, as they have good reason to, that the humiliating condition of their commerce in South America is neither natural nor fatal, and there is an easy method of improving it, by overcoming the artificial obstacles which stand in the way, in order that the Great Republic may take the first place in rank and honor. The distinguished commissioners will commit a grave error if they attribute the prostration of their commerce to antipathies or bad feeling toward their country, or to a predilection for European manufactures. On the contrary, there is no one in Chili who does not recognize the superiority of American products, natural and manufactured, and as regards price and quality they are preferred to European goods, with perhaps the exception of articles of fashion and fine arts, which they themselves import. Yet in spite of this the English and Germans have almost a monopoly in all the South American markets.

Whenever we have established and maintained steamship communication with foreign countries increase of trade has rapidly followed. As the result of establishing the "Red D line," running between New York and the ports of Venezuela, our trade with that country has rapidly increased from $1,793,000 in 1879 to $2,953,000 in 1884, and $3,043,339 in 1885.

But I must pass over much that I would like to say and conclude. On the eastern side of South America the Brazilian line stops at Rio. Fifteen hundred miles beyond lies the great Argentine Republic, with a population of 3,000,000, with fourteen sovereign states confederated into a central government, with her president and national congress, her capital, Buenos Ayres, having 500,000 people, 40,000 of whom speak the English language. We are scarcely known there as a nation.

In 1884 this great republic bought $94,000,000 worth of manufactured goods. Of this amount $38,000,000 came from Great Britain; from France, $17,000,000; from Germany, $9,000,000; from Belgium, $7,500,000; from Spain, $5,000,000; from distant Italy, $4,000,000, and from the United States seven and one-half million dollars' worth—only about 8 per cent. of the United States.

Last year she bought $20,000,000 worth of clothing, every article of which could be manufactured in the United States; $8,000,000 worth of furniture, all of which we might have furnished. In the last twenty years we have bought of her $110,000,000 worth of raw material and sold her but $47,000,000 worth, paying her $63,000,000 in cash, which has gone to enrich our foreign rivals. But with whom does the Argentine Republic trade? In the last twenty years we have sold her $40,000,000 worth; Great Britain, $254,000,000, and France, $313,000,000. In 1883 Great Britain sold her of cottons alone $6,665,000 worth; while the United States sold her but $150,000 worth. The United States sold her of woolen goods but $7,500 worth; while Great Britain sold her $2,169,000 worth. The United States sold her of iron and steel $500,000 worth; while Great Britain sold her $6,725,000 worth. Her total commerce with European countries is 90 per cent. of her whole trade, and with the United States only 10 per cent.

What is the trouble? We have no communication with the Argentine Republic, and her great capital, Buenos Ayres, or with Uruguay, and the beautiful city of Montevideo. Twenty-one lines connect her ports with Europe.

In 1884, 3,629 steamers arrived at the great city of Buenos Ayres. How many from the United States? Not one; 3,629 steamships and 3,445 sailing vessels.

Of the total tonnage that entered the port of Buenos Ayres, 24 per cent. was under the British flag, 16 per cent. under the French flag, 9 per cent. under the German, and 24 per cent. under the flags of other countries, and the United States had the miserable representation of 2 per cent. of the sailing vessels. Two hundred ocean steamers ply between Buenos Ayres and European countries, and if you want to reach Buenos Ayres you must take passage across the Atlantic and sail from England. Forty to sixty steamships arrive in Buenos Ayres every month. English, German, French, and Italian lines have over one hundred steamships carrying the mail into her ports, with freight and passengers. Italy has a fast mail line, running in fifteen days. We must send our mails, passengers, and freight by Europe. All these lines are liberally paid for carrying the mails.

How easily the Brazilian line could be extended down to the Plate. Yet we refuse to encourage this line in such an undertaking. And if she takes the venture we will promise to pay her only the sea and inland postage on the mails carried.

Look to Uruguay, with her seven hundred thousand people and her capital of one hundred and four thousand. The annual value of her commerce is $50,000,000, her imports $26,000,000. In 1885 she imported from Great Britain $8,000,000 worth, from the United States $1,500,000. She imports annually $20,000,000 of manufactured products, more than one-fourth of which comes from England and 18 per cent. from France. Between 1862 and 1882 she bought of the United States $21,500,000 worth, of England $115,000,000, and of France $118,500,000. In 1882 England sold her of cotton goods $3,000,000 worth, the United States $580,000; of iron and steel $1,269,000, the United States $98,000; of woolen goods $865,000, the United States $1,350. England sold her $350,000 worth of coal, the United States $2,000 worth; $286,000 worth of hemp, the United States $38,000 worth.

Twenty-one lines of steamers from Europe enter her ports—eight British lines, four French, two Spanish, one Italian, one Belgian, one with the Netherlands, none with the United States—only an occasional sailing vessel. The result is we have no trade with this country and can not have until we have regular communication. Merchants can not order goods of us with any certainty of receiving them in time for their trade. The South American Commission say in their report that if a merchant in Uruguay orders goods from the United States he must wait from five to nine months for returns, while he can cable an order to Europe and receive his goods in forty-five days. The commission note an instance where a nine-months' order had not been received, and last cargo from New York was one hundred and twenty-five days to Montevideo, six months after the order was mailed. In another case a merchant ordered three hundred harvesters from the United States—for they use harvesters there—from an American manufacturer and sold them all before they arrived. They found such ready sale that he ordered three hundred harvesters more. But it was seven months before he heard from this order and long after the harvest was over. We had no mail communication except via Europe, hence the delay. But a cablegram was sent to England, and in sixty days the goods were there. The advantage of mail communication is that the foreign merchant in ordering goods knows they will arrive in time to meet his trade, as mail lines run upon regular time between intermediate and terminal ports; come up the eastern coast of South American to the great Empire of Brazil, with its population of 13,000,000, with which country we are connected by the New York and Brazilian Steamship Company.

This empire bought of England in 1885 $34,000,000 worth, and of the United States only $7,317,000. We import from this country annually about $50,000,000 and sell her only eight or ten millions. Her total imports are $140,000,000 annually. Of this, England furnishes 45 per cent., France 17 per cent., and the United States only $8,500,000.

In 1883, she bought of England $15,778,098 worth of cotton goods, of the United States $612,828; of England $95,613 worth of hats and caps, of the United States only $119 worth; of England $1,446,572 worth of flax manufacture, and only $49,000 from United States; from England $5,674,407 of iron and steel, $1,034,648 worth from the United States; $1,000,000 of manufactures of leather goods from England, and $36,000 worth from the United States. She bought of Great Britain $1,618,000 worth of woolen goods; of the United States only $2,842 worth. She bought $1,500,000 worth of wearing apparel from France, and only $17,000 worth from the United States.

In twenty years England sold Brazil $630,000,000 worth of products, and the United States in the same time only $138,000,000. Why do we have so little trade with this country? Because the only communication we have with this great empire is by means of the New York and Brazilian Steamship line, having only three steamers, making a monthly service. Yet against great odds this line has maintained its course and carried our flag into the rich ports of this empire. While we have but this one line with three steamers, Great Britain has three lines with fifty-five steamers, France has nineteen steamers, and Germany fifteen steamers—eighty-nine in all from these three countries, connecting their ports with the ports of this empire. All these European lines are liberally paid for carrying the mails, while we paid this Brazilian line last year from New York to nine ports in Brazil only $4,210. It costs that to handle the mails. Brazil pays annually over $1,000,000 for her foreign-mail service, and the United States stands whining on the wharves and asks that her mails may be carried as a deadhead. It is astounding that we pay this line only $4,210 for 6,000 miles, while we pay a line from Lake Charles to Cameron, 55 miles, $4,090. Upon no principle of justice or equity can this inequality be maintained.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only glanced at the surface of this question. The man who talks "subsidy" upon this does it to mislead. The statement of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads that this $800,000 must go to existing lines is an error. He makes his computation on a basis that they must each be paid 50 cents a mile. That is a mistake. The service is to be let to the lowest responsible bidder, not to exceed 50 cents. We pay the coastwise service 57 cents, while some of the English lines that carry our mails across the Atlantic receive about 40 cents a mile.

We pay annually to foreign ships for carrying our mails $280,000. Why not do something for our own lines? Only $46,000 last year to our own steamship lines. We produce annually eight billions of manufactured goods; seven and a half billions of agricultural products; together fifteen and a half billions; and we need a market for our surplus products. Where shall we find it? It lies at our very door. It is amazing to me that when a proposition is made to expend only $400,000 to existing lines connecting with Central and South America, with China and Japan, and to use another $400,000 to extend these lines and put on new ones that may serve to connect with other countries and open the ports of the Atlantic and Gulf States to the commerce of the republics of South America—it is amazing, I say, to me that gentlemen will resist it on either side of the House.

What object is there in opening the Mississippi River at an expense of twenty, thirty, fifty million of dollars, and then permit the commerce she carries to be taken and carried under foreign flags? What sense is there in it? What sense is there in expending $450,000 on the harbor of Galveston to give an outlet for her commerce, and then say to American lines proposing to carry that commerce, "We will pay only 3 cents, or the letter postage, for carrying the mails between that harbor and the ports of Central and South America?" I would not permit England to hold this market, at the very threshhold of our own country, if by paying a liberal compensation for carrying the mails I could rescue the trade from her. All we plead for is reasonable compensation.

It has been said this is in the interest of the steamship companies alone. That is not true. That it will advantage them no one can deny, but that they are the only parties to be benefited is wholly untrue. I hold in my hand the manifest of a single steamship, the Finance, of the Brazilian line, which sailed from New York on the 28th of February last. What cargo did she have on board? She had on board, going from the United States to those South American countries, $250,000 worth of American goods—a quarter of a million dollars' worth of American products on one steamship going to the markets of those countries. This a matter that concerns the steamship companies alone?

Where did that cargo come from? It came from twenty-four States of this Union. Look over the manifest—hardware, scales, and fur goods from Connecticut; axes, organs, and printing-presses from New York; locomotives, cars, steel tires, and machinery from Pennsylvania; wagons and sewing-machines from New Jersey; ranges from Maryland; cotton cloth from Georgia; steel springs and furniture from Michigan; car wheels, sewing-machines, and furniture from Ohio; rosin and tobacco-cutters from North Carolina; scales and axes from Rhode Island; engines and machinery from Illinois; sheetings from South Carolina; furniture and slates from Vermont; watches and clocks from Massachusetts; bacon and hams from Kansas; scales and wire from Missouri; flour from Wisconsin and Minnesota; canned fruit and hominy from Maryland; fish from Maine; canned fruit from Delaware; oysters from Louisiana; flour from Virginia; rosin and hominy from Oregon, and agricultural implements from Iowa.

So, Mr. Chairman, I could go on through the list, embracing the products of twenty-four States, and amounting in value to a quarter of a million of dollars taken from American farms and factories and going to these South American markets. Yet men will say that this matter concerns only the steamship companies! This measure must commend itself to the good judgment of the American Congress and the American people. The South specially must be deeply interested in its success. It is high time that we cease to pay foreign ship-owners $75,000,000 annually for carrying American freight, passengers, and mails.

I hope this appropriation will be made. I hope my amendment will be adopted, allowing $400,000 to be used on the present lines, and authorizing the Postmaster-General to use the balance to extend those lines and to put on new ones. I would not permit England to hold the markets of Mexico, Central and South America, if by paying a liberal compensation to American steamships for carrying the mails I could rescue them from her. This can be done, and by so doing we will reopen our mines, relight our furnaces, dispose of our surplus products, give employment to labor and investment to capital, and augment the prosperity of the nation at home and her prowess upon the sea. [Applause upon the Republican side.]

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty minutes.

Mr. MILLARD. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to occupy the hour to which I am entitled under the rule, but if I should forget myself, I will ask the chairman to call me down at the end of forty-five minutes, as I desire to yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WAKEFIELD].

At the risk of being a little desultory, I will adopt a course which I had not intended, and first make some reference to a portion of the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. He has made some comparisons between the amounts paid in other branches of the postal service and those paid in the foreign sea-service, and he has mentioned some steamboat lines carrying the mails upon our rivers and some carrying the coastwise mails. I presume the gentleman's figures are correct so far as the amounts paid are concerned, but I do not think they prove what he designs them to prove. If we have paid none too much to steamboat lines for carrying our inland and coastwise mails then his comparisons might have some force, but his figures may prove simply that we have been paying too much to the steamboat lines, and in some instances that is what they do prove. The gentleman, if I did not misunderstand him, mentioned the steamboat line running from Port Townsend to Sitka, Alaska. If I am wrong about that I hope he will correct me.

Mr. BURROWS. I did refer to that line.

Mr. RIGGS. The gentleman referred to that line and compared the amount paid there in 1885 with the amount paid to some steamship line the name of which I forget at this moment. If I have the correct figures (and they have been furnished to me officially) we paid in the fiscal year 1885 to the steamboat line carrying the mails from Port Townsend, Wash., to Sitka, Alaska, $18,002.06.

Now, the fact about that line is that since then that same service has been let for less than half that amount, and we are still, I imagine, paying too much. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that since that time the same service on that same steamboat line has been let for $9,000 per annum. I call his attention and the attention of this committee to the fact that during the nine months beginning April 1, 1885, and ending December 31, 1885, the pay upon steamboat lines was reduced $118,062.06.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand the gentleman does not criticise the statement I made as to the amount paid last year.

Mr. RIGGS. Oh, no; I think the gentleman is correct, or substantially so, about the figures.

Mr. BURROWS. But the gentleman states that in reletting the service has been let lower?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir. I am not criticising the statement of fact that the gentleman made, only the inferences he sought to draw. These official figures are evidence to my mind—and it seems to me they should be evidence to the minds of all—that we have been paying too much upon the steamboat lines. I believe, as I have said, that we are still paying too much.

The gentleman from Michigan also compared the amount (and it is very large) which we pay for our star-route service with the gross amount we have paid to American steamships for foreign mail service. I presume the gentleman has not forgotten the frauds, the swindles, and the great scandal connected with our star routes not long ago. We have been paying too much. The Government has been defrauded in this star-route service; and I have no doubt we are still paying too much upon many of these routes. So that the figures, when furnished, do not necessarily warrant the inference which the gentleman seeks to draw, that because we pay $18,000 or a little more for mails upon a coastwise and inland route of 1,349 miles, therefore we should pay the same amount for a sea route of the same length.

If I understood the gentleman—and I certainly understood one remark near the close of his address—he insists that no question of subsidy arises under this Senate amendment, that the proposition to pay $800,000 to American steamships for carrying the mails to the countries named in the Senate amendment is simply a proposition to pay what the carrying of those mails is fairly worth—nothing more. I understood him to say, I think he did say, near the conclusion of his remarks, that whoever talks "subsidy" upon this amendment talks simply to deceive. I will do the gentleman the credit of supposing him to believe that; he is entitled to the credit of sincerity in that statement; and I want him to have all he is entitled to in that particular. But I insist that the only attempt to deceive here is on the other side. I believe that this amendment was cunningly devised with the view of deceiving.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Give us some evidence of that; do not merely assert it.

Mr. RIGGS. If I should rest upon assertion alone, the assertion on one side is as good as the assertion on the other.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Michigan gave one hundred reasons for his assertion.

Mr. RIGGS. I did not hear them, and I think I heard all he said.

Now, before I go further I want to call attention to the construction of this amendment, and I will do so in connection with the provision which by an amendment of the Senate was inserted in the annual appropriation bill to pay the expenses of the Post-Office Department for the present fiscal year. That amendment provided—

> For transportation of foreign mails, including railway transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $800,000. And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the transportation of any part of said foreign mails, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder, at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points: Provided, That the mails so contracted shall be carried on American steamships, and that the aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed one-half of the sum hereby appropriated.

In the debates on this floor upon that amendment it was conceded by all that its language was merely directory; that under it the Postmaster-General would not be bound to make contracts or even to advertise for bids and lettings. It was so understood and so stated on the floor repeatedly by gentlemen who were in favor of the amendment and by the gentleman on this side of the House who had charge of the Post-Office appropriation bill. Now, the Postmaster-General for reasons assigned in his last annual report—reasons which I think are entirely satisfactory—failed to make any contract for carrying the mails under that provision. The terms of the provision were directory. Now, I want to call attention to the terms of the amendment under discussion which appropriates a similar sum of money, but does not, as it comes to us from the Senate, contain the proviso limiting the expenditure under such contract to $400,000 for American steamships. The language of the amendment under consideration is:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with the owners of such American steamships, for a term of not less than three years nor more than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points, in the most direct and feasible sailing course between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth. And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services, he shall, so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places, respectively, in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels, and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned.

What construction must be put upon this amendment? The first portion of it uses the language that "the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts," &c., employing the phraseology which was used in the amendment inserted in the Post-Office appropriation bill passed at the last session. And I suppose that portion of it would be held to be merely directory.

We have been told on the floor to-day by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], in response to the statement made by the chairman of the committee, that we are not bound under this amendment to pay 50 cents a nautical mile to these American steamships. I understood the gentleman to make that statement.

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. RIGGS. I understood him to criticise the statement of the chairman, and to say that we were not bound to do it.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood the chairman in making his statement to base it on the theory that 50 cents a nautical mile, which is the maximum, would have to be paid, when in fact the service is to be let to the lowest bidder, and it may be only 25 cents a nautical mile.

Mr. RIGGS. As I construe this amendment there is no discretion left with the Department; the discretion is all left to the steamship companies. Under the amendment placed on the bill last year by the Senate there was discretion, and that discretion resided in the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BURROWS. What does the gentleman do with this phraseology in the amendment?

At a rate of compensation not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile.

It limits the Postmaster-General.

Mr. RIGGS. Certainly; but I am talking within the limit of 50 cents a mile. I understand the gentleman from Michigan to say that we are not bound to pay 50 cents a mile. I think the result would be that we would be compelled on every American line existing to pay 50 cents a mile.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman is speaking of the result. He is to advertise for bids, and to get it as much lower as he possibly can.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not compulsory on the Posmaster-General?

Mr. RIGGS. Having given the promise to yield a portion of my time—a promise which I intend to keep—I do not propose to let this discussion run into a desultory colloquy.

I understood the chairman of the committee presented the matter in this line, or rather his qualifications were based on the theory we would have to pay 50 cents a nautical mile. I understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to criticise that statement, and to insist we would in all probability not be compelled to pay that price. I believe it will result in the payment of 50 cents a mile if it be adopted.

Mr. BURROWS. The statement I made is this: The chairman argued if we pay the whole of the $800,000 we would pay these lines 50 cents a mile. I understand by the amendment I propose to offer at the proper time it would take only $400,000 for existing lines, and the balance for the extension of new lines, and we would not pay 50 cents a mile.

Mr. RIGGS. Now, when the chairman made his statement the gentleman's amendment had not been presented, and there was no notice that it would be presented. The discussion was then proceeding on this amendment of the Senate. I will state why I think the Government will be compelled to pay 50 cents a nautical mile. The first clause of the amendment would seem to be directory and to leave a discretion in the Postmaster-General; but the latter clause provides as follows:

And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services, he shall—

That leaves no discretion—

so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places, respectively, in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels, and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned.

There is no discretion there. If he fails to receive bids under the first clause it is provided he shall then cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from the places enumerated in the previous portion of the amendment upon American vessels at a rate not to exceed 50 cents a nautical mile.

In the light of what has occurred in this country in the history of the carrying trade on railroads and on steamships is it unreasonable to imagine a case in which the steamship companies, by concert, would refuse to bid under the first clause of the amendment, and would therefore compel the Postmaster-General to contract with them under the latter clause?

Mr. BINGHAM. He contracts under the general statutes.

Mr. RIGGS. He is authorized under the first clause to advertise for bids, but if he shall be unable to make contracts for such service he shall then, as far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels, and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned; that is, of 50 cents a mile. There is nothing in that clause about advertising, nothing said about bids, nothing said about competition, and no competition is contemplated.

The design of the amendment was to leave the discretion in the steamboat companies to refuse to bid by concert of action, and compel the Postmaster-General without discretion to pay them their own price, not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile; and I believe that is the fair and legitimate construction of the amendment.

We are charged with seeking to deceive. I perhaps have said it already; but whether I have or not, I wish emphatically to deny any attempt to deceive upon this side of the House. It is upon the other side that that charge must rest; and I claim that upon a fair construction of the amendment, a legal construction of it, it can bear no other interpretation than I have given to it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. RIGGS. I have but a very few minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I merely want to call the gentleman's attention to the language of this amendment:

And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services, he shall as far as possible, &c.

That is the whole scope of it.

Mr. RIGGS. I understand that, and if the steamship companies refuse to bid under the first clause, then the Postmaster-General says, I want you to carry the mails; I am compelled to have them carried if possible upon American steamships——

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly, "if possible."

Mr. RIGGS. And what will you carry them for? The answer is manifest. They well say, 50 cents a nautical mile, and he is bound under the latter clause of this Senate amendment to give them that amount and there is no escape from it. That is the opinion of the Department, that is the opinion of good lawyers who have examined the subject; and I repeat I do not believe there is any escape from that legal construction of the amendment, taken altogether. I believe it was prepared and designed for the purpose of depriving the Postmaster-General of discretion which he had under the previous appropriation bill. I believe it was designed to leave the discretion entirely with the steamship companies.

When we remember, Mr. Chairman, that they have pooled heretofore, when we remember that the railroads are pooling as they are doing now, when we learn from the last reports of the Pacific Railroad, which gentlemen no doubt have received within the last week, that that road is expecting some trouble with the Government now because it and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company have pooled, when we know this is occurring every day in the year, is it unreasonable to suppose that by concerted action these steamship companies will drive the Postmaster-General into a corner and force this payment? I do not believe it to be an unreasonable construction, but I do believe that it was designed for that very purpose.

But, Mr. Chairman, leaving that, there are so far as some of their methods are concerned two classes of steamship-subsidy men. There is one class represented by such gentlemen as A. Foster Higgins, of New York, who at the Boston meeting a few days ago said, "We want subsidies, and there should be no quibbling about it;" and another class who are saying we do not want subsidies; we are opposed to subsidies. Now, so far as the first class is concerned it is not necessary to undertake to ascertain what the design of this amendment is. They understand that it is designed to pay them subsidies, that that is its object; but as to the other class, and as to their friends upon this floor, such friends as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who says there is no subsidy in this, it is necessary to institute inquiry to ascertain whether or not it really amounts to a subsidy.

If the sum of $800,000 is necessary to pay reasonable compensation to American steamship companies carrying the mails they do carry to the countries named in the amendment, then I favor an appropriation of $800,000. I favor paying the American steamship companies all that is fair, even a liberal pay for carrying the mails, but when it comes to a business proposition of undertaking to hire somebody to carry our mails, considering that proposition by itself regardless of the question of promoting the interest of ship-builders and ship-owners or the private interests of anybody else, then I insist that if we pay a dollar more than what is liberal and fair pay we pay just that much more than we ought to pay; and here I want to institute some comparisons.

I remember the gentleman from Michigan on a former occasion said to the House—I came near saying curtly; he said it bluntly at all events—that those of us who chose to compare the money paid for carrying the United States mails with the amount paid for the parcels-dispatch and for freights could have no argument with him; and yet notwithstanding his longer experience, notwithstanding the confidence with which he has made his statement, I am disposed to make a comparison of that very character. I do not intend to weary anybody else, or myself, with a long detail of figures here. It is sufficient for my purpose and for the purpose of this argument to state general results, which the official figures will bear out.

You may take the "Red D" line, the United States and Brazil line, or any other line of steamers, take all of the lines, compare the rates paid on each by the Postmaster-General, or which he has offered to pay and which they refused, with the rates paid for carrying freights, and it will be found that the Postmaster-General offered these American steamships, if they would carry our mails to such countries as they were sailing to (and impose upon them no other conditions than those that were imposed by the conditions of their ordinary traffic)—he offered them a rate that would pay them from forty to nearly one hundred times the amount that they were getting for carrying freight.

He offered them a rate which would pay them an average of four times as much for carrying the mails as they were receiving for carrying an equal weight of parcels at their dispatch rates. Now, is it fair to compare these payments? I think it is if we consider the duties and responsibilities, the labor and the expense, attaching to parcel packages and freight and those attaching to the mails.

What duty is imposed on a steamship carrying the United States mails that is not imposed on that steamship in carrying parcels at its dispatch rates? What responsibility is imposed that is not imposed in carrying parcels? What expense is imposed that is not imposed in carrying parcels? The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], alluding I think to the United States and Brazil line, called attention to the fact that the steamship company is bound before its steamship leaves the port of New York to send to the post-office there and get the mails. He alluded to that fact in a way which impressed me as if he spoke of it because he believed that fact entitled that company to 50 cents per nautical mile for carrying the mails. What does it really cost them? Eight dollars and fifty cents; that is the amount, as appears from their own statement signed by their own manager. Their round trip is about 10,000 miles, and the mileage at 50 cents per nautical mile would be over $5,000 a trip. Is the outlay in the port of New York in sending for the mails and putting them on board a warrant for such a sum? It is an item, of course. If they pay out $8.50 they should have it repaid, and should be compensated fairly for carrying the mail.

But what duty do they perform in carrying the mails? They send to the post-office and get the mails; they are put up in closed bags; they convey them on board and lock them up in a small room 8 feet each way. That is the end of the attention the mails have until they reach the port of destination in South America. And then they were bound when they carried our mails to put these mails ashore as speedily as was practicable and deliver them to the postal authorities at the port of destination. That is the attention the mails have.

Now take the expense at one port of destination. At Pernambuco the United States and Brazil Company say they expend $30.80 on one trip in putting the mails ashore. I do not know whether they do or not. I sometimes doubt it, for the reason that other portions of the statement will not bear close inspection and analysis. But suppose they do expend $8.40 at New York and $30.80 at Pernambuco, these payments furnish no warrant for paying 50 cents a nautical mile, amounting to $5,000 a round trip, for carrying the mails.

They ought to get back the money they pay out and a fair amount for carrying the mails. But when they have put the mails on board, receiving them in closed pouches, locked them up in a small room, put them ashore at the port of destination and delivered them to the postal authorities, then their duties are performed. Now, what is their duty as to parcels carried at their dispatch rates for which they get not one-fourth of what the Postmaster-General offered them, sea and inland postage, for carrying the mails. They receive them I suppose at some office in New York city and convey them to their vessels; they take just as good care of them as they do of the mails. They are sent at higher rates, because the senders attach some special value to them; just as in our own country we send parcels by express and pay higher rates than freight rates because some special value attaches to the parcel. They take as good care of them as they do of the mails. At the port of destination they deliver them to some office just as they deliver the mails at the post-office. And so far as duty is concerned and so far as responsibility is concerned the duties and responsibilities attaching to the carriage of these parcels are as great as those attaching to the carriage of the mails, and greater, because at least in some sense they become insurers of the parcels, while they are not insurers of the mail. Nobody ever heard of an attempt to hold a steamship company or the master or the owner of a vessel responsible for the loss of a mail or any injury to it. Such a thing has never occurred.

With regard to freights, of course most of the freights, except the highest class, are stowed in the hold of the vessel. They do not occupy as valuable space as the mails or the parcels carried; but the Postmaster-General offered to pay this special sum, one hundred times as much as they carry freights for. Is not that enough? It certainly is enough upon all comparisons that can be made or that I have been able to make.

I am not satisfied that we ought to pay any line more than sea and inland postage for carrying the mails just as a business proposition. If we want to encourage the building of more ships, if we want to encourage ship-owners to put more ships on the sea, and to establish lines to ports where we have none, and to build up a commerce by paying subsidies, that is another thing. But if you want to do that, I insist that the fair way to the people who provide the money to pay these subsidies, if they are paid, is to call the transaction by its right name, and not pay subsidies to ship-owners and those who establish steamship lines to carry on business upon the sea, under the pretense of simply paying fair compensation for carrying our mails.

There have been some facts presented with reference to what the service would cost us under this amendment, but they were made and the figures that I have were made upon the assumption that we might be compelled to pay 50 cents per nautical mile.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a business proposition, why do you give the preference to American ships? Why not take foreign ships if you can get the service for less?

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say to the gentleman that in my judgment the very fact that we do give that preference to American ships and pay them more than foreign ships, at first blush seems to tend slightly in the direction of the views of that side of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It contravenes your business principles.

Mr. RIGGS. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; I do not believe that one cent and forty-seven hundredths is enough pay for carrying a letter 5,000 miles. And the Postmaster-General did not think it enough, and offered our own steamships more. But that is what we pay foreign ships for carrying each letter that is carried from this country across the Atlantic under the International Postal Union rates; and when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] alluded to what he called the shameful fact that we were paying foreign vessels about $280,000 out of the total of $326,000 that is paid for carrying our foreign mails, one who had not examined the facts and figures might have been impressed with the idea that we were paying those foreign vessels higher than we paid our own vessels or higher than we proposed to pay our own vessels, when the truth is that the Department has offered our own ships nearly three times as much for carrying the letter mail as we have ever paid, or as, under the law, we can pay to foreign vessels.

If the depression of our shipping comes from the fact that we are not paying enough or that we do not propose to pay enough for carrying the mails, why is it that we are taunted here on this floor with the fact that foreign vessels receive what has been alluded to as munificent pay for carrying the transatlantic mails, although they are paid at a less rate than we have offered our own vessels? If that is a lucrative trade why do not our own ships enter it? There is no prohibition. They can go into it if they choose.

The fact that they do not enter that trade proves that the difficulty does not grow out of a failure on the part of the Government to pay properly for carrying the mails, if it proves anything.

It has been mentioned, I believe, by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to-day—it certainly was mentioned by him on a former occasion—that we were paying, or had paid, one foreign line as high as 80 cents per mile for carrying the transatlantic mail. We paid that line not so much by two-thirds as we have offered our own line. We paid the international postal rate, and the estimated large mileage, if it ever existed, resulted from carrying a very large quantity of mail.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What line does the gentleman mean?

Mr. RIGGS. I do not know to what line the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] alluded, but he mentioned what he alleged to be the fact that we had paid as high as 80 cents a mile for carrying our foreign mails. We paid those vessels the international rate of sea postage, and we have offered our own vessels sea and inland postage, which is nearly three times as great, on letter mail.

Under the proposed amendment if we pay 50 cents per nautical mile the New York, Havana and Mexican Mail line will receive, supposing it carries the same weight of mail as in 1885, $11.06 a pound for carrying letters. That is allowing them the same rate for carrying papers that they received in 1885. They then received 8 cents a pound for carrying the newspapers and 6½ cents a pound for carrying parcels, which are more valuable. I presume that 8 cents a pound for carrying newspapers, which are not valuable and require less care than parcels, is ample compensation.

Allowing them the same rate of pay for newspapers, which is enough, they would receive $11.16 per pound for carrying letters against 6½ cents a pound for carrying parcels, many of which are more valuable than letters. Now, why the difference? Is it necessary to make this difference in order to give them fair pay for carrying the mails? I insist it is not. Take the "Red D" line. Suppose they should carry the mails for the next fiscal year, and this amendment should be in force, and we should pay them 50 cents a mile, if they should carry the same number of pounds carried in the fiscal year 1885 they would receive $65.05 a pound for carrying letters; that is, allowing them the same rate of pay which they received in 1885 for carrying papers, which is 1 cent a pound more than they charge (and they fix their own rates) for carrying parcels more valuable than newspapers, parcels which receive as much attention as newspapers.

Now, is it necessary in order that we may give these companies fair pay for carrying the mails that we shall pay them 1 cent more per pound for newspapers than they receive for parcels, and $65.05 per pound for carrying letters? I insist it is not; and in any comparison that can be made under the proposed legislation with other rates, and with what is paid in other branches of the service, the result reached, so far as I am concerned, leads me to conclude that no such sum as $800,000 is necessary. I do not believe it would be regarded as necessary by anybody except the gentleman from Michigan. He has said substantially that it is necessary to appropriate this sum in order that we may give fair pay for carrying the mails. I suppose he thinks so. I do not believe such is the fact; but I believe the fact to be that such a sum of money will pay a bounty to these steamship companies. I believe that is the intention.

I have some respect and some admiration for the candor of those steamship men and their friends who say, "We want subsidies and there should be no quibbling about it," and who have caused a bill to be introduced into this House, and a counterpart in the Senate, proposing directly to pay 30 cents per ton bounty on every thousand miles sailed and pro rata for each fraction of a thousand miles, which by the way is substantially the French tonnage bounty system. I have admiration for such candor; but when people propose under the disguise of paying merely fair pay for carrying the mails to pay subsidies to the owners of steamships, my respect is not so great. For myself, I would have no taxation of the poor to pay subsidies to the rich.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RIGGS] has now occupied forty-five minutes of his time.

Mr. RIGGS. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WAKEFIELD].

Mr. HEWITT. Before the gentleman from Minnesota proceeds, I trust he will allow me a moment in order that I may present, and have printed in the RECORD, so that members may read it to-morrow, an amendment which I desire to offer. It is designed as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Japan," in line 104, to the end of the paragraph, and insert the following:

"Four hundred thousand dollars; and the Postmaster-General shall, as far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places respectively in American built and registered steamships, provided the same can be carried for a reasonable compensation, to be by him determined, but not exceeding the rate of 50 cents per nautical mile for the distance usually traveled in the most direct and feasible course between the terminal points hereinbefore specified."

Mr. WAKEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended until yesterday to take any part in the discussion of this Senate amendment. My attention, however, has been called to some misstatements of my position that have recently appeared in the public press of the country, and in justice to myself I am compelled to ask the indulgence of the House while I correct the errors into which they have fallen.

Since I have had a seat in this House I have endeavored fearlessly, if unobtrusively, to do my duty in respect to all questions upon which I have been called upon to act. In every vote I have given here I have, to the best of my judgment, reflected faithfully the views of the generous people who have twice elected me to represent them on this floor.

As a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to which was assigned the duty of formulating the bill making an appropriation for the postal service of the Government, I investigated very carefully and with no little labor such facts and data as were obtainable in order that I might arrive at a just conclusion as to the demands and needs of that branch of the public service. I scrutinized more particularly and with special care the item in the Book of Estimates having relation to our foreign-mail service. After a very critical examination of the precedents and a thorough investigation of the facts and figures furnished by the superintendent of this service bearing upon the question of just compensation, and after an exhaustive discussion of this item by the subcommittee, we came to the conclusion with great positiveness some months ago, a conclusion that was subsequently reached by the House, that the full amount originally recommended by the Postmaster-General for this service would not be required, and therefore we reduced his estimate $50,000.

It will be remembered that when the bill was under discussion here on its final passage the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] moved as an amendment to the report of the committee to increase the item for the foreign-mail service $50,000. During the discussion that arose upon his proposition, it will be remembered by those who did me the honor to hear me, I gave to the House some of the reasons which compelled me to the opinion that the Burrows amendment ought not to be adopted. I thought and said then, on the 25th of March, as I think and say now, that that amount or any amount in excess of that agreed upon by the committee and subsequently ratified by the House is a largess, a donation, pure and simple, and one that is not demanded by any needs of the service nor by any reasonable anticipations of its increased efficiency. The bill went to the Senate without change in this particular, and now comes back to us with an amendment involving an expenditure of $4,000,000, or $800,000 per year for five years.

From the well-known position occupied by me when the bill was under consideration by the subcommittee, and from the views expressed by me on this floor when this bill was under discussion in Committee of the Whole, it seems not unreasonable that I should be found among the opponents of this Senate amendment.

It is impossible for me to conceive that any person of ordinary intelligence could suppose that having earnestly and honestly antagonized any increase of the amount to be allowed for the foreign-mail service, in every stage of its consideration, I should now find myself justified, either in the vestibule of my independent judgment or in the forum of my conscience, if I permitted this Senate amendment to pass without an earnest and emphatic protest against such action. Such a course would be a veritable illustration of the action of that class of people who strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.

Under the special plea of affording better mail facilities, and with the illogical assurance that our merchant marine would be greatly stimulated and encouraged, the sum of $50,000, which was modestly suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, has swollen under the liberal manipulations of the Senate to the enormous sum of $4,000,000. I had the right, I think, as a member of this House, to expect that my views in this regard, honestly formed and expressed without excitement or passion, would be criticised by those who disagreed with me in a dispassionate and honorable manner. I regret to be compelled to say that such has not been the fact. I seem to have incurred the hostilty of some of those corporations that hope to be the recipients of a large share of this enormous bounty. Their enginery of detraction and slander has been set in motion. Their lobbyists have been busily engaged in the work of misrepresentation and abuse. Through these instruments and such of the newspapers of the country as have a warm side for anything with a subsidy in it they have sought to blacken my reputation and rob me of my good name, either for purposes of intimidation, or to punish me for exercising my right of individual judgment.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the telegram I have marked. In this connection I will say that the newspaper I have sent up is the Pioneer Press, of Saint Paul, in my State, one of the ablest and most widely circulated journals of the Northwest.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAKEFIELD AND GUENTHER—A COBDEN CLUB MAN'S WORK.

[Special telegram.]

WASHINGTON, May 12.

John Codman, the well-known free-trader and agent for the Cobden Club, is here to assist in the defeat of the Senate amendment to the post-office appropriation bill, appropriating $800,000 for the transportation of United States mails. Mr. Codman is one of the most active and able advocates of free ships. He was sent here by the English steamship companies, and is assisted by an agent of the German lines. They are working together, and have GUENTHER of Wisconsin and WAKEFIELD of Minnesota in tow, who are the only Republicans that will oppose the amendment. Senator SAWYER and other friends of GUENTHER have remonstrated with him for his opposition to the industries of this country and his attacks upon American shipping, but he appears to be very decided in his position, and nothing can move him. Codman is furnishing material for a speech GUENTHER intends to make in the House.

The author of that telegram, I am credibly informed, has within the last few weeks manifested a very lively interest in the success of this subsidy scheme. I do not desire to question his motives in so doing. They are no doubt such as are satisfactory to him, and with which I have nothing to do. But I do desire to say in reference to that libelous telegram that so far as it relates to me, and I may add so far as it relates to my colleague on the committee, I have no doubt it is a malicious and inexcusable falsehood. It is wholly and utterly false; false in general and false in detail. There has been and is no attenuated shadow of a shade of foundation in fact for any assertion or innuendo it contains.

To my knowledge I have never even seen the gentleman mentioned in the telegram, or his German associate, or any of his or their representatives, nor the agents or representatives of the English or German steamship companies. At the risk of arguing myself unknown, I will say further that until I saw Mr. Codman's name in this telegram I can not recall that I ever heard the name.

I will add that I here assert, without mental reservation or secret evasion of mind, that I have never been solicited or requested, directly or indirectly, by any living soul to oppose this Senate amendment. On the other hand, I have been frequently, persistently, and earnestly urged to support it by leading representatives of some of the corporations to whose benefit it would inure. I will say, however, in justice to those gentlemen that they discussed the subject as gentlemen of honor and integrity, and I am convinced they would not countenance or approve of the character of attack upon an honorable opponent that that telegram illustrates.

A cause must be weak indeed that is driven to such reprehensible measures to sustain itself.

If I am not misinformed as to the authorship of the telegram, at least one gentleman has called on me at his urgent solicitation and requested me to withdraw my opposition to this amendment. I was not prepared to stultify myself, and respectfully declined. Is it for this that I am the object of his righteous indignation? Is it because of this refusal that this infamous falsification of the facts is wired to the leading newspaper of my State as an item of news from the Federal capital? It so appears.

I believe the final action of the House upon this proposition will prove that he has not many of the elements of a wise political prophet, as his action in this regard has proven that he has few of a high-minded and honorable journalist.

I have no wish again to go over the field of discussion that resulted in March last in a decisive expression of the judgment of the House upon the principle involved in this Senate amendment.

The $50,000 proposition came to us with the plausible argument that the amount was needed to enable the Postmaster-General to pay the South American and China lines a fair and reasonable compensation for the transportation of our mails. The House after full discussion regarded the amount proposed as a subsidy, and repudiated it.

This $4,000,000 amendment comes to us upon no such theory, and we are asked to ratify and adopt it for another and entirely different reason. We are told it is needed to foster and build up our foreign trade, to revive and encourage our shipping interests, and to enable us to compete with the great powers of Europe for the carrying trade of the world. Especial claim is made that this munificent donation from the public Treasury will enable our merchants and manufacturers to better cultivate trade relations with our sister republics, and will give to us great advantages over our foreign rivals. It is claimed, also, that it will result in the construction of more American ships, and thus lessen the tariff of freight rates to those southern ports. Is there any reason or logic in such a claim? Now, I think it is well understood and conceded that if this money should be voted it will from the very logic of the situation, pass into the hands of the Pacific Mail, the Brazilian, and the Red D lines. With what result? Why, it appears to me with the natural and unavoidable result of giving additional power to those lines and enabling them to maintain a complete monopoly of the passenger and freight traffic to the ports we desire to reach. Intrenched as they will be in the favor of the Government they will establish such rates as they please, and those rates will have no restriction except their own conceptions of profit. What encouragement appears here for the construction of new ships and the establishment of new and independent lines?

As to the other proposition that it will increase our trade with South America, I can make no better or more conclusive answer than by presenting a few extracts from the report of the commission appointed under an act of Congress approved July 7, 1884, to ascertain and report upon the best modes of securing more intimate international and commercial relations between the United States and the several countries of Central and South America. This commission examined a large number of the principal merchants and business men of Central and South America with a view if possible of ascertaining the best policy for us to pursue to secure their trade. The first extract I will read is from the statement of Mr. L. H. Boulton, who, as a correspondent of the owners of the Red D line, would not be likely to be prejudiced against Government subsidies. He resides at Caracas.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GUENTHER was recognized, and yielded a portion of his time to Mr. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. The following is the statement of Mr. H. L. Boulton:

Q. Please state the name of your firm.
A. H. L. Boulton & Co.
Q. What is the name of your New York firm? Have you a branch there?
A. It is not a branch. We are correspondents. The two houses are entirely separate.
Q. What is the name of the New York house?
A. Boulton, Bliss & Dallett.
Q. Are you an American citizen?
A. No; I am an English citizen.
Q. But your trade is mostly with the United States?
A. I may say entirely.
Q. Will you give us, in your own language, a history of the establishment of the line of steamers from here to New York?

I would like Mr. Boulton to say how long his firm has been doing business here.

A. Since the year '30.
Q. Give us the history of your lines of steamers from here to New York, please.
A. The history is that we used to run a line of sailing vessels, and finally made up our minds that possibly steamers might do as well as sailing vessels.
Q. In what year did you commence the steamship lines?
A. Toward the end of 1879.
Q. How many vessels does it consist of?
A. Three steamers.
Q. How many originally?
A. Two.
Q. Give us the history of the building of those steamers; where were they built?
A. Two of them were built in Philadelphia, and we are building a third. We have three, really, but one is a chartered steamer. We have a branch steamer running to Curaçoa, to Maracaibo also. She was also built in Philadelphia.
Q. What are your views as to the effect of the United States Government favoring the lines in some way? What would be the effect on the commerce between the two countries?
A. A subsidy from the United States Government might enable us to introduce other improvements in the line that would facilitate business, but I doubt if it would pay to run a weekly line instead of fortnightly steamers unless business should increase considerably.
Q. Is the facility the same for American merchants for getting their goods here?
A. The same tariff for all nations.
Q. Then why does not the United States, which is nearer to you, get that business?
A. They can not produce as cheaply as in Europe.
Q. The people would be just as willing to buy of us if they could buy as cheaply?
A. There would be no difficulty at all if they could produce as cheaply. Generally speaking, the American manufactured cotton goods and hardware are superior to the European article; very likely too good.
Q. The point is that our manufacturers do not adapt themselves to the tastes or the fashions, whatever it may be, of the consumers in Venezuela as well as the European?
A. Yes, sir; that in part, but it is not even that; it goes farther than that. The quality of American manufactures is superior to the general importation from Europe, as far as I understand, and consequently dearer.
Q. But they cost more?
A. Yes, of course.
Q. And if our dry goods manufacturers want this trade they must manufacture cheaper?
A. Not only that, but they must accommodate themselves to European ways.

I will call the attention of the committee to the statement of Mr. Rohl, our consular agent at Caracas, and particularly to his views in reference to the present facilities for steamship communication between that port and the United States:

Q. You are our consular agent here?
A. Yes sir; I have lived here in Caracas nearly always, and my business is dry goods.
Q. Where do you import most of them from?
A. From England and Germany.
Q. What should our manufacturers do to obtain your trade here?
A. They should send out commercial travelers with samples, whose duty it would be to study the special requirements of the country; offer their goods and send their orders home. A great part of the business is done on credit, so that these agents would have to become acquainted with the different firms to know to whom to give credit and up to what amount. This is the way the English and German houses abroad do. Many of their travelers visit Venezuela annually, principally English, and many repeat their visits periodically, so they are always ready to give precise information to their employers about the trade, the standing of their customers, and the changes in the taste of the people. They do, of course, business in certain branches different one from the other.

The trade with the United States is gradually growing and increasing by its own efforts, and there is every reason to believe that it will further increase.

Q. Would increased steamship communication increase trade?
A. It seems to me that the steamship communication we have is quite sufficient. The owners of the Red D line do all in their power to meet every requirement. Their ships are first-rate vessels as regards speed, and in every other respect. Formerly we had two steamers a month; now we have three. Two are their own, and are ships built expressly for this trade; one is chartered. This last one will be substituted in two months by a third, now being built in the United States, so that traffic will be carried on by steamers all built in the United States, and owned by the firm of Boulton.
Q. Is there any prejudice against American goods; have the people been "beat?"
A. There are slight complaints in that respect. Some merchants have complained, and it has come under my notice that manufacturers have not sent the second or third time what they did first.

Hear what Mr. Behrings and E. Valiente say are some of the reasons we do not increase our trade with their people more rapidly—

STATEMENT OF A. BEHRINGS.

Q. How long have you lived here?
A. Since 1868.
Q. Can you suggest anything whereby the United States can increase its business in this country?
A. I have not thought on that.
Q. The problem is submitted to you, how can we get the business of Venezuela? We take nearly all you raise now, but we do not give you all you use. We take a large proportion of your products.
A. It is increasing already, the dry-goods branch, and may increase more even. We bring "lona" and grey drills and printed goods and cotton.
Q. Do you deal in ready-made clothing?
A. No; the duty is very high. We bring quite common articles for the people from England and Germany; they are cotton goods. Bagging comes principally from England. It can be made cheaper there.
Q. Have you very heavy import duties?
A. Yes; we caculate them at 40 per cent., more or less.
Q. Would a reduction of duty tend to increase importation?
A. I think so; no doubt.
Q. Do you find your freight charges a great burden?
A. No; and freights from the United States, I will say, are more favorable than from England.
Q. How much cheaper are they?
A. From the States it is 30 cents, and from England 50 cents.

STATEMENT OF E. VALIENTE.

Q. Are you a citizen of the United States?
A. Yes. I was naturalized in New York. I was in the States since I was seven years old. I am a Cuban by birth, and I am manager of the gas-works here.
Q. What could our Government do to increase trade between the two countries?
A. Well, I have traveled for a great many American houses throughout South America, and have endeavored to push American goods. Spanish is my native tongue; and I was twenty years a broker in New York. Americans know very little and study very little and cater very little to our business. Our merchants in New York will not make prints, for example, of the width and size required, unless you give them an immense order. They will not touch it. Another thing is the packing. In the States they have the idea that we are fond of 1½-inch planks, and we have to pay duty on the gross weight. That alone kills three-fourths of the business, because you have also the interior freight to pay.

Q. How should they do the packing?

A. Like in Europe. The chairs they have learnt to pack, and that is why we get them here now. I received three hundred and forty boxes of brick the other day, and the planks were so heavy that I have not been able to sell them for any price. I had to burn them. Our packing in the States does not compare with Europe.

Mr. HENEY. American goods come here all smashed, and the European goods, the finest crockery and china, you will find nothing broken.

Q. In what other articles should there be a difference in packing?

A. Generally speaking, in everything. The American houses advertise here, but if you send an order they can not fill it; does not know the requirements of the custom-house, and the invoice is generally sent wrong, and therefore we have to deal with commission houses. A very few houses deal directly with the people, as Lanman & Kemp, for instance, and they do an immense business. They are the largest drug house in the United States for foreign articles. They are manufacturers. They sell by commission men traveling around the retail dealers. They have agents in all parts and they fill any order at once, and if not satisfactory you simply hand it over to the agent.

Q. Will you please give us any information you can?

A. We import dry goods and export coffee. We import from England, Germany, France, and the States. We get cotton goods from the States.

Q. Coarse or fine?

A. Coarse.

Q. Do you find them satisfactory?

A. We import only a few from the State.

Q. Why?

A. Only since the last ten years we have tried it, but they did not suit the people. In general the goods in England are cheaper.

Q. We understand the American goods are better, but they do not suit the people.

A. Yes, sir; by and by they will be convinced it is better to pay a higher price and get a good article.

Q. They are finding that out in Mexico. What would you suggest to American manufacturers to enable them to get this trade here?

A. For agents to come with regularity with samples from New York or the States, and if we find anything suitable we always take it.

Q. Then you would say to send intelligent, good men with samples of goods, men who know how to talk to the people?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can the government here do anything to help you?

A. Yes; but they won't.

Q. Is there much smuggling?

A. Yes, sir; but not near Caracas or La Guayra, but in the western and eastern part of the country.

Q. Do they get away some of your custom by smuggling?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there much complaint about the partiality of custom-house officers?

A. No.

Q. Would an increase in steamship lines help you?

A. It is quite sufficient now. We export also cocoa and cotton. The cotton we send to Hamburg. We also export bark quinine from Puerto Rico, which is found in the west.

Q. Is there any of that bark manufactured here?

A. No, sir.

Q. Then you export it and you bring the medicine back?

A. Yes. We also export a few hides and skins. Our coffee we export to Hamburg and France, and also to New York.

Q. Where do your hides go?

A. We exported very few last year. They mostly go to New York. These hides are from animals killed for beef.

Q. Is there much wool raised?

A. Only a little in Maracaibo.

Q. We would like to know what obstacles there are, and what our people must do to push them aside, to get your trade.

A. As I told you, in our branch it depends on seeing the goods.

Q. Do you go and inspect the goods when you buy, or do you order by samples?

A. By samples, and sometimes we go over there.

Q. Generally you go by New York?

A. Generally, since the steamers run regularly.

Q. Do steamers come here from New Orleans and Baltimore?

A. No; now and then a sailing vessel comes with lumber.

Q. Do you export any oranges and bananas?

A. No, sir.

Mr. ROHL. They have tried it, but did not continue it.

Q. Are many quinces raised here?

A. Very few.

Mr. Gossrich appears to be a well-informed importer, and he does not regard an increase in steamship lines as necessary for their trade.

The report of the commission is full of this character of testimony, showing that there is no such demand for additional steamship facilities as the friends of this subsidy assert to exist.

I will cite but one more extract, taken from the statement made to the commission by Winfield S. Bird, our consul at at Laguayra. I will not read his entire statement; it is too long; but at the close of a very intelligent and well-considered exposition of his views upon the whole subject of our trade relations to that country he says:

In conclusion, to summarize and emphasize what is here stated, it may be taken for granted that the people of Venezuela are well disposed toward and prefer to trade with the merchants and manufacturers of the United States; but these latter, indifferent to the tastes of the people, or disinclined to comply with the demands of the market, suffer a large and lucrative commerce to fall into the hands of Europeans. It can be remedied by sending active and energetic agents, familiar with the Spanish language, to traverse the country and talk up our goods. We have ample and excellent steam communications with New York, and everything is propitious and inviting, so that with proper and well-directed energy, our already thriving commerce with this country may speedily acquire a volume and extent that will be, from every point of view, permanent and satisfactory.

But I have read enough to show, I think, that the great obstacle to an increased trade with Central and South America, or at least one great obstacle to that trade, is not so much the want of proper facilities for transportation as the neglect on the part of our merchants and manufacturers to accommodate themselves to the peculiar conditions that exist there. If they would adapt themselves and their wares to the tastes and demands of those peoples, consulting their needs as to quality and price of their goods and merchandise, extending to them the same credits that they receive from England and Germany, sending their agents there with samples and employing the same means they employ at home to extend and enlarge their sales, there is no reason to fear that they would not in due time largely increase their trade. When that is done, when they have built up by energy and integrity a lucrative business, when the demand comes for greater transportation facilities there need be no apprehension but the supply will equal the demand. [Applause.]

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion this appropriation of $800,000 does not even rise to the dignity of a subsidy. It is "neither fish, flesh, nor fowl." If I understand it correctly, and I think I do, a subsidy is government aid to individuals or private corporations, given for the purpose of promoting immediately, or ultimately at least, the public interests, the general welfare of the people. If this element of public benefit is lacking, as it is in this case, then it is not a subsidy, but a donation—a gift, pure and simple.

Now, I have occasionally given my vote to donate moneys from the public Treasury where the circumstances justified such a course—where, for instance, a great calamity had befallen a portion of the American people—with reference perhaps to the great floods, when the cause of humanity appealed to us. I did it because I knew that the great heart of the American people would justify such a course. I did it "for sweet charity's sake." [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, can it be charity in this case to vote this appropriation of $800,000—or of $4,000,000, because it amounts to nothing less—given as it is for five years—for charity's sake to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company? What public interest will it promote? Will it increase our commerce? Will it revive our foreign carrying trade? Will it give us better mail facilities? To all these questions every unprejudiced mind, everybody who has studied the situation impartially, must answer in the negative. If you are unsophisticated enough to think that this amount will either revive our foreign carrying trade or benefit the commerce of the country, you might as well try to cure a severe case of chronic Washington summer malaria with an annual dose of one grain of quinine. [Laughter.]

It is not my purpose to discuss at this time the decadence of American shipping, or the tariff, or any other economic question. I may touch on them briefly and incidentally only to sustain my argument.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that this appropriation is a donation for the benefit of a few parties who have neither the intention nor the capacity to render any equivalent service to the public for it. [Applause.]

It is, in my opinion, an unjustifiable attempt to vote the people's money to private parties disguised under the gauzy pretext of extending our commerce and reviving our foreign carrying trade. It must be a hard task, even for the cheek of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, to make this proposition and keep up a sober face. [Laughter and applause.]

It seems grotesque enough to make a half-way intelligent horse laugh. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I can not help considering this appropriation, to say the least, as an impolitic measure, which should find no response on either side of the American House of Representatives, charged with the high duty of guarding the people's money and seeing to it that the public money is conscientiously expended, and for public purposes only. [Applause.]

About one-half of this sum will go to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. They are the beneficiaries of this scheme. Will any gentleman deny that? I pause for a reply.

It should seem, Mr. Chairman, that after the exposure of this malodorous company in the Forty-fourth Congress, when it was shown by the investigating committee in the report submitted to this House by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Kasson, that the sum of $900,000 had been expended to carry through a similar measure in that Congress—it should seem that we ought to be very cautious at least with this company; that we should shun it like a burnt child does fire, that we should shrink from that company and not touch it with a 10-foot pole. [Laughter.] This Pacific Mail Steamship Company is the same company that until recently received an annuity of over a million of dollars from the Pacific roads under a stipulation that they would not carry passengers and freights as low as they profitably could afford to do.

What do you call such a contract, my friends, Democrats and Republicans alike? I call it a conspiracy against the public interests. It was a corrupt bargain and opposed to every principle of public policy. I say it was nothing short of a crime on the part of both contracting parties, both parties having been subsidized for the purpose of building up the commerce of the country. Instead of doing that, they hampered it all they could by levying extortionate tribute upon the very people who had voted them millions of acres of the public lands and millions of dollars, presenting such a spectacle of black ingratitude before the world as would have caused the robber knights of the mediæval ages to blush with shame. [Laughter and applause.] And from this company and their ilk, you and their advocates expect good to flow to our commerce!

Mr. Chairman, I almost lose patience when I have to listen to such propositions. It seems enough to make a saint use unparliamentary language. [Laughter.] Vote money to this company under the pretext of increasing and extending our commerce! Vote it to the very parties that conspired to burden and oppress it. Will the time never come when we will be able to see things in their proper light? Will we always lend a willing ear to the sham pretenses of these grasping corporations? Is it only necessary for them to come to us under the thin guise of unselfish patriotism, sound their hypocritical cants about the glory of the starry banner, reminding us of the inquisition of the mediæval age, when every horrible and dark deed done was justified by it as pro majore Dei gloria, brag about the immense benefits they will render to the commerce of the country, provided we give them so much cold and glittering cash, and yet you will give it to them! Is it not strange that we should not see through their confidence game? Are we really as verdant as that, to be made their victims so easily, to be deluded and deceived like green country boys by their artful hypocrisy and shallow pretenses? [Laughter.] Will we always take their bait? Are we really what their brethren of lower degree call "su ers?" [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the main charge that has been brought in all campaigns for a number of years against my party—the Republican party; the party by which I have stood ever since I became a voter and by whose principles I stand to-day, under whose colors I fight my political battles; the party which I loved when in power and love still more since it is out of power [applause]; the party of Lincoln and Grant; the party whose achievements are engraved in indestructible letters on the golden tablets of history; the party that preserved the Union, that made us a powerful and prosperous nation—I say, Mr. Chairman, the main charge brought against us as a party, was the popular belief in the truth of it which has caused the Republican party, in spite of the truth of its principles, in spite of its glorious achievements, to find itself to-day out of power, were charges just of this character, charges that we had been too free with the people's money; that we had granted too many millions of dollars for subsidies; that we had paid too dearly for what we had received; that we had allowed ourselves to be made the victims of scheming corporations; that we had been too credulous; that we had been imposed upon too frequently by land-grant and subsidy-hunting railroad, canal, and transportation companies; that we had dealt too much in class legislation for the benefit of monopolies and millionaires, and that we let the plunderers pull the wool over our eyes—these were charges that many honest people believed, and the result was our dis-charge from power.

Now I, for one, do not want to see my party furnish ground for a renewal of such charges. If we have done a wrong in the past, let us confess it and not do it again. [Laughter.] Confession is good for the soul, and it brings forgiveness. [Laughter and applause.] Let us profit by the sad experiences of the past. Do not let the Shylocks of the Pacific Railroad Company make us pull their chestnuts out of the fire any more. [Laughter.] Is it not enough that our wings have been singed? Shall we fly back into the flame again unmindful of our former experience?

Mr. Chairman, I stand here upon this floor as a Republican whenever questions arise involving political principles upon which parties divide. But, sir, on this question I do not rise as a Republican, for it does not involve a political principle. I stand here as the representative of my people, irrespective of party. They who have honored me with the proud distinction of representing them on this floor have a right to expect that on questions of such a character, of such far-reaching possibilities, I should vote, not as a Republican, not as a Democrat, not as a Mugwump [laughter], but as a representative of the American people, boldly and fearlessly, not minding the dirty and uncalled-for insinuation that I have been influenced by improper motives or by the agents of foreign transportation lines.

Right here I will say that no man will ever successfully impeach my patriotism as a through-and-through American citizen. [Applause.] I am not susceptible to be led astray by agents of the Cobden Club. I take my stand because I believe I am right. I am fully aware that my motives will be assailed. Still I must give vent and voice to my honest convictions, though the heavens should fall.

I will read an article from the New York Tribune similar in tone to that which my friend and colleague on the committee had read from the Pioneer Press, of Saint Paul, Minn.:

John Codman, the well-known free-trader, is in town, with the object, I understand, of defeating the Senate amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill, which provides $800,000 for the transportation of foreign mails. Mr. Codman is one of the most active advocates of free ships, and has an article in the current number of The North American Review, in which he favors the repeal of the protective tariff on ships and the passage of the Mormon bill. It is charged here that he is an agent of the English steamship companies, and that in his present task he is assisted by an agent of the German steamship lines. They seem to have captured GUENTHER, of Wisconsin, and WAKEFIELD, of Minnesota, who are the only Republicans who will oppose the amendment.—N. Y. Tribune, May 13.

That is a fair sample of the slush sent by certain newspaper writers to the metropolitan press, which they expect their readers to swallow. I have great regard, as my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WAKEFIELD] has, for honest representatives of the press. But in response to this falsehood, I affirm right here, as if I stood in the presence of my Creator, that I do not know Mr. Codman from Adam or Moses [laughter]; that nobody ever approached me in any manner for the purpose of inducing me to vote against this subsidy, but that, on the other hand, a number of persons, not members of this House, have tried to induce me, not by reprehensible or corrupt means, but by persuasion, lengthy arguments, and button-holing, to vote for this subsidy. In view of my steadfast opposition to this subsidy in the Forty-eighth Congress and to similar propositions in the Forty-seventh this article is not very appropriate. I should not be surprised if this "smart Alick" of a correspondent will write another brilliant article and make the startling announcement that the free-traders have at last succeeded in capturing Mr. MORRISON, or that before long Mr. WILLIAM D. KELLEY is likely to join the protectionist wing of the party. [Laughter and applause.]

I think that the New York Tribune, a great and influential paper, ought to be a little more careful before it takes to smirching the character of those who happen to differ from it. Some newspapers have made the statement that the Postmaster-General, Mr. Codman, and others were furnishing me material for this debate. In answer to this false statement I will say neither the Postmaster-General nor Mr. Codman nor any other person living has furnished me anything designed for this discussion. What facts I have were looked up by me in public official documents, and nobody but myself is in any degree responsible for what I say.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am determined to make my fight without fear, and I trust also without reproach. I ask my party friends not to provoke public condemnation by voting for this donation. Let us pause and reflect well before we jump into the deep water of this subsidy, not knowing where we will land. Do not let us enter upon the policy involved in it, which may eventually cost this country untold millions.

The bill to which this proposition is an amendment is one making appropriation for the Post-Office Department. It is not the business of that Department to devise means to extend our commerce. This bill deals solely with the business of carrying and distributing the mails. It is not one for the extension of commerce or to revive American shipping.

Right here I wish to say a word to my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. He quoted about an hour ago a tabular statement of the Brazilian line and said they carried in one cargo a value of $250,000 to Brazil. Now, if they did do such a large and I take it profitable business, why should they pose here before this Congress as mendicants and ask for aid?

Mr. BURROWS. Is that any reason why the Government of the United States should not pay for the service the company performs for it?

Mr. GUENTHER. I claim, as I claimed in the speech I delivered some weeks ago, that the compensation for carrying the mails, sea and inland postage, is sufficient.

Mr. FELTON. Is not that a matter of opinion?

Mr. GUENTHER. I say I claimed that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. On what basis does the gentleman place it?

Mr. GUENTHER. On the basis of weight.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Would he estimate the charge on the mails on the basis of weight the same as on coal?

Mr. GUENTHER. The same as I would estimate the charge on the carriage of valuable matter, such as express matter perhaps.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do express companies carry diamonds on the basis of charging by weight?

Mr. GUENTHER. In carrying diamonds they charge for value; but other express matter they carry by weight, and I presume according to the space it occupies. I am willing to base the compensation on space and weight.

Mr. BURROWS. Do you apply the express-matter rule of compensation to other branches of the service, the star-route service and the coastwise service?

Mr. GUENTHER. I have nothing to do at present with the star-route service. I deal now solely with the carriage of the foreign mails by steamships.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask you if the rule of compensation which you apply to that applies in other branches of the service?

Mr. GUENTHER. I guess not; but I have not paid any attention to that subject, because I intended to speak here upon the carriage of the foreign mails by steamship lines, not to the inland service:

Mr. SPRINGER. On the star-route lines the service is put on specially for the carrriage of the mails; but in these cases the vessels make the trips all the same, whether they carry the mails or not.

Mr. BURROWS. Passengers and freight are carried on the star-route lines also.

Mr. GUENTHER. Now, I must go on with the subject under debate. Establish such a precedent as you propose and where will you end? There are a number of industries in our country that are not profitable. Why should we refuse to make them so by appropriations from the public Treasury, if we do it for the sea-carrier? The workingmen of the country claim that they do not receive adequate compensation. Why should not the Government make appropriations for them the same as to these transportation companies? What higher right have these companies than the laborers? When the farmers of the West call upon Congress to protect their wool-growing interests against ruinous competition which has almost destroyed that branch of industry, when they ask for the restoration of the wool tariff of 1867, their demand, instead of being complied with, is met by the proposition to completely kill the wool-growing interest of the country by placing wool on the free-list.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Just as you meet this.

Mr. GUENTHER. I do not meet it in that way. Mr. Chairman, when the farmers of my own and other States engaged in the cultivation of tobacco ask to have the duty on Sumatra tobacco increased, or at least the existing law amended it so thatwill do what it was intended to do, masterly inactivity prevails; but as soon as the elegant gentlemen of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and other lines ask for a contribution of four million of dollars—because that is the sum given in this appropriation, $800,000 for five years—so that they can add that amount to their incomes and increase the value of their stock, we seem to run over each other in the effort to comply with their demand.

The farmers are coolly told that nothing will be done for them, but that they are expected to cheerfully contribute their share to subsidize these great corporations so as to enable them all the more to import wool and tobacco, the product of slave and pauper labor, to the detriment of that class of American industries. To make them swallow the pill you sugar-coat it, and call it a measure "for the promotion of the commerce of the country;" but, gentlemen, the nauseous taste remains, because the coating is too thin. [Laughter.]

You strangle the Western farmer and expect him to buy the cord to do it with. You expect him to commit financial hara-kiri and generously propose to furnish him the knife to perform that operation. I repeat what I have said on former occasions: secure your home market first before you reach out for other markets. You import annually hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of articles which we might as well manufacture in our own country. Devote your attention to the problem of controlling this home market first, which will give profitable and steady employment to every poorly paid and unemployed workman the year round. Do not fritter away your money and your efforts in foolish attempts to secure one dollar by paying five for it. One to five represents about the proportion of the exports and imports to and from the countries to which you want to establish additional lines.

Why do you want to reach out across the seas to semi-barbarous countries for that which lies at your feet? Why do you want to go into direct and ruinous competition with every country on the face of the globe, with the products of their cheap pauper labor, the paupers of Europe, the slaves of the Dutch and the Spanish possessions, the coolies of China, and the pariahs of India? Mr. Chairman, let me read a few lines from a letter recently written by a gentleman for whom I entertain the highest respect, and with all due regard to my honorable friend [Mr. BURROWS] I will say that on the subject of promoting the industries of the country I take the authority of Judge KELLEY in preference even to the authority of my distinguished friend from Michigan. Judge KELLEY, in a letter written on the 2d of this month, says:

HIS RECOLLECTIONS OF PAST LABOR AGITATIONS IN PHILADELPHIA.

To the editor of the Press:

SIR: I am old enough to have participated in the struggle of her working people for the establishment of the ten-hour system in Philadelphia, and young enough to remember the denunciations that were poured upon the heads of participants in what was called that revolutionary movement for the shortening of the hours of labor. I have long believed that if the eight-hour system of labor for both man and machinery prevailed throughout the industrial world there would be less suffering, a greater average duration of life, and a higher and more general degree of contentment among the wealth-producing community throughout the world.

Mark the following language:

The increasing productive power of man should have long since secured to labor a larger share of its production than it anywhere receives. The struggle for cheapness, which is dangerously stimulated by the competition of nations for foreign markets, has reduced the laboring population of transatlantic countries to such hard conditions and wrought it to such intensity of discontent as to have unsettled the foundations of government and individual property in those countries.

If as the laborer's power of production increases his share of the joint products of labor and capital had been equitably increased, the terrible contrast between the rich and the poor, which now shocks the observant traveler in every foreign land and is painfully apparent in the large cities and some other portions of our country, would have been impossible. The well-paid and prosperous laborers would have made a profitable home market in every country, and every reduction of wages that is made in obedience to the demand for cheaper goods has been a step in the wrong direction.

The universal establishment of eight hours as the limit of a day's labor would improve the social habits and increase the intelligence of the laboring classes, as the reduction from thirteen hours to ten per day did nearly sixty years ago.

If it be suggested that an eight-hour law be beyond the scope of government, I reply that it is the duty of a popular government to defend and protect the property of that great body of its citizens whose estate consists solely of the physical and mental ability of its members to perform productive labor, as much as it is to protect and defend the real and personal estate of those who derive incomes from such possessions.

WILLIAM D. KELLEY,
Member of Congress from Philadelphia.

That is first-class doctrine, and I stand by it. What has England profited by this system? A few great merchants and great corporations have enriched themselves at the expense of the masses of the English people. The people have been ground down; their wages have been reduced more and more; and in order to keep up this system thousands upon thousands of precious human lives were sacrificed to the greed and the fiendish avarice of those merchant princes of England.

I say, Mr. Chairman, every million of mammon acquired in the foreign trade of England was bought at the price of human blood. All the oceans upon which the merchant marine of England floats to-day can not wash that stain away. The smell of blood is there, and all the perfumes of Arabia can not sweeten it. Let other countries have the trade with these countries. Let them have their trade, their discontent among the people, and their constant wars, while we in this blessed land of ours, on the other hand, secure our own market, accompanied by prosperity and the blessings of peace. Let the English and the French strike their balances. Let them add up the sums they have paid for subsidies, the hundreds of millions of dollars swallowed up by their wars to protect their foreign commerce, not counting even the thousands upon thousands of human lives sacrificed in that cause, and then count the actual gain realized, and see whether the balance will not be on the wrong side.

Mr. Chairman, we hear day after day the doleful songs of these subsidy-asking shippers. Those who are not posted must receive the impression that we have hardly any vessels left, while in fact we are to-day second on the list of maritime powers. If we look at the comparative growth of the tonnage of the merchant navies of the principal maritime nations we find that we have held our own. I will give you a few figures.

TONNAGE OF LEADING NATIONS.

	1880.	1883.	Gain.
United States	4,068,034	4,235,487	167,453
Great Britain	8,447,171	9,131,418	684,247
Norway	1,518,655	1,546,793	28,138
German Empire	1,182,097	1,269,477	87,380
France	919,298	1,003,679	84,381

They may be dry, but they are instructive. Comparing the year 1880 with 1883, the latest for which I had official figures, the United States in 1880 had a tonnage of 4,068,034 tons; in 1883, 4,235,487 tons, a gain of 167,453 tons. Great Britain, which leads the world, and I think will always lead the world in the carrying trade on account of her geographical position——

Several MEMBERS. Not always.

Mr. GUENTHER. Well, as long as we are as happily situated as we are, having a protective system in this country, I do not envy England the doing of the carrying trade of the world almost at a loss.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. We can do better business.

Mr. GUENTHER. We are engaged in a more profitable business right here at home.

In 1880 the tonnage of Great Britain was 8,447,171 tons; in 1883, 9,131,480 tons; a gain in round numbers of 684,000 tons.

Norway is third on the list of maritime nations. Now, do you think this fact has made Norway the third most powerful nation in the world? I presume to a great many this statement will be utterly astounding. But the fact remains that Norway is the third largest maritime power to-day.

In regard to the tonnage of the German Empire and France I gave the figures. We, Mr. Chairman, gained in tonnage 167,453 tons—pretty nearly as much as the gain of France and Germany put together, 171,760 tons; and this in spite of three years' bounty, a large bounty, in France.

Will these comparative figures justify the incessant lamentations of these Eastern gentlemen about the decadence of American ship-building and ship-owning? Will they always succeed in making it a convenient pretext for asking help from the Government? Will they never "give us a rest" [laughter and applause], and allow us to pay some attention to the grievances and needs of the farmers of the West and of the laboring element of the whole country? I am surprised at the alacrity, the agility, and the zeal with which my Western colleagues always rush to the succor of these Eastern gentlemen whenever they blow their little whistle. [Laughter.] Why not pay a subsidy to the farmers when the price of wheat is so low that it does not pay to raise it? We might do so with perfect propriety if you pass this appropriation to the steamship owners.

If we establish the principle involved in this amendment it will furnish a pretext for every industry to call upon Congress for aid, whether it is needed or not. If it is your purpose to embark in the business of extending Government aid to private business enterprises, declare that policy boldly; act like men; but do not dodge the question by putting a rider upon a Post-Office appropriation bill.

I will print some remarks of the Postmaster-General about this subject.

A MEMBER. Oh, well, but he is a Democrat.

Mr. GUENTHER. I know he is but I think he has given this subject a good deal of study. If not, I presume the very men who have made it a study are Republicans in the Department; and so the insinuation that I should not listen to what the Postmaster-General says, because he is a Democrat, has no force whatever for me. I am not one of those who pretend that because a man is a Democrat he most always be wrong. I quote from the last annual report of the Postmaster-General:

Much has been said about employing the postal appropriation to aid American commerce. When Congress shall desire to invest the Post-Office Department with care for that object, it can not be doubted it will easily choose language which will plainly convey the purpose and impose the duty. Until then that Department can not rightfully employ the moneys appropriated for the postal service to secure objects not intrusted to its care, however meritorious in themselves.

It may be properly further observed of this, that during many years the practice of granting pecuniary aid to American lines was pursued at so great a cost, and to so little advantage, that it was long since wholly abandoned; that when followed, Congress had directed it; and if that body designed its renewal, presumably it would again have declared the purpose.

But the policy of subsidizing American steamship companies, or any of them, is not involved in the decision arrived at. That pertains to Congress instead of the Department, and therefore the Department can only award just compensation and then stop. If exigencies may arise to justify its adoption, it seems to belong to that body to recognize their existence and prescribe the object and amount of the grant.

The Postmaster-General adds:

No exigency exists for the establishment of any new lines to carry the mails. Those now on the sea as common carriers are sufficient for the present needs of the foreign mail service. They appear to have maintained themselves for years without Government bounty in profitable pursuit of their business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the advocates of this proposition point us to the glorious results that have been accomplished in other countries by granting subsidies. Why should not we imitate them they say? If you think they are always right on economic questions why do you not adopt free trade in this country because England has it?

I claim, Mr. Chairman, that the benefits other countries have derived from subsidies have not been adequate to the expenditures. France has paid the largest subsidies in the whole world. Let us compare her with a country that so far has paid none.

Take Germany; and I want to say to gentlemen who point to Germany as a country that has always paid subsidies that they have been entirely misinformed; that Germany has never paid a dollar's worth of subsidy to any steamship line. They have just embarked in that business, but they have not paid anything as yet. They have gone at it like men. They have made an appropriation of $30,000,000 for the establishment or the creation of new lines. But this proposition here does not ask for the creation or establishment of new lines, but simply proposes to pay money to lines already in existence.

Now I will compare France with Germany, because France on the one hand has paid and is paying large subsidies and Germany is not.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But she has agreed to pay them?

Mr. GUENTHER. Yes, she has agreed to pay them, but she has not yet paid out a dollar.

Mr. MILLIKEN. She has agreed to pay subsidies to her steamship lines.

Mr. GUENTHER. Yes, but it is not so much for the promotion of her commerce as to further the colonization schemes of Germany. I can say from a comparison of France with Germany that the increase in tonnage has been greater relatively in Germany with no bounty than in France since her adoption of large bounties.

It may be interesting to know that in eight years prior to the era of bounties the French tonnage of steam-vessels increased relatively much faster than that of its continental competitors; than it did afterwards.

Let individuals and corporations understand that somebody is going to back them, that they may rely on some power other than their own push and energy, and the result will always be the same. To my mind the reason why American enterprise has been so successful, that we to-day lead the world in almost every branch of industry, is that the American has not relied on a paternal government to help him out of a scrape, but has established the motto, "Help yourself; be self-reliant; fight your own battle." [Great applause.] That has been the stimulus by which we have made a steady and conspicuous progress, and not by pleading the baby act. [Laughter and applause.]

France, after she adopted her bounty system, from 1881 to 1884 inclusive, paid in aid of her vessels directly and indirectly nearly $28,000,000. In the same period Germany paid her vessels about $320,000. During that time France increased her tonnage 1,768 tons over that of Germany. In other words, by paying twenty-seven millions and a half of dollars more for the same period, for the same purpose, and having about as much tonnage as Germany, than Germany did pay, France succeeded, by means of an expenditure of over $27,000,000, in increasing her tonnage to the enormous extent of 1,768 tons! [Laughter and applause.] That is about half the size of a good steamer. By the time they have gained a whole vessel it will have cost the large sum of $55,000,000; a rather expensive price to pay for one vessel. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. If Germany did so much better without subsidies than France did with them in increasing her tonnage and extending her commerce, why has Germany adopted the policy of granting subsidies and appropriated so much money for that purpose?

Mr. GUENTHER. We can not legislate here in this country to prevent the Germans from making fools of themselves if they choose. [Laughter and applause.] Germany has done a great many things I do not indorse.

Mr. McADOO. Let me inquire of the gentleman whether it is not a fact that France has physical advantages over Germany in having more ports and ports easier of access?

Mr. GUENTHER. Yes; certainly. Germany has only a northern sea boundary, while France is surrounded by the seas on several sides.

Mr. McADOO. Are not the advantages all with France?

Mr. GUENTHER. Yes; the advantages are all with France.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why does the gentleman go back on his country?

Mr. MILLS. Has French commerce fallen off?

Mr. GUENTHER. Of course it has.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Some gentleman referred to Germany as your country.

Mr. GUENTHER. Did any gentleman refer to Germany as "my country?"

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes; I said I did not think the gentleman could go back upon his country.

Mr. GUENTHER. Upon my country! What do you think is my country! [Great applause.] I want to say to the gentleman from Maine that, although I was born on German soil, and I have no reason to feel otherwise than proud of it; I am still prouder, as I always have been, to call myself an American citizen. [Great applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I am glad to hear the gentleman's outburst of patriotic devotion to the country. I have never had any doubt of that. But I refer to the gentleman's own country; I meant the land of his birth, when he spoke of them slightingly; and I suggested the presumption that he did not intend to go back on them or say they were fools, as I thought I understood him to say.

Mr. GUENTHER. I did not say they were fools, but I say that Germany may have made a fool of herself, as doubtless my friend has done, and as I myself have occasionally done, made a fool of myself. [Laughter.] I think they made a mistake in this matter; that is what I referred to.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I am sorry the gentleman ever did it. I have never noticed it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GUENTHER. I say it because I am nothing but human and it is human to err.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman can plead guilty for himself, but not for me.

Mr. GUENTHER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was speaking of the result in France of this subsidy system. The official statistics show that its shipping has decreased during the years pointed out, instead of being benefited and built up.

Besides, the lines that had been called into existence through the bounty system are earning nothing or else are in a state of bankruptcy to-day, and other lines are paying little or no dividends at all, and during all of that time France has paid in the way of bounties, direct or indirect, to her vessels about $3,000,000 more than England, Austria, Italy, Belgium, and Germany combined. These are official figures, and yet we are told by the advocates of subsidy that it will benefit commerce to imitate France. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that the ocean carrying trade, in consequence of these subsidies and bounties granted to the shipping interest, has so overstimulated ship-building that there is to-day a carrying capacity in excess of the world's need. There can be no question about that, as my friend from Pennsylvania just suggests.

The year 1885 has been especially disastrous to the shipping business. Subsidized lines are paying little or no dividends; the net earnings are trifling or nothing, and the whole business has become unprofitable, and that is the reason that Americans, who seldom make fools of themselves in a matter of business, do not embark in this business now.

How much will it require to do what gentleman expect to do in the way of building up our shipping interests in this country and making it self-supporting? The advocates of the bounty system claim it will bring new lines into existence and new vessels into competition. It will not do it, I venture to assert. On the contrary, subsidize a line for five years, as proposed here, and you create a monopoly; and I do not say that as a demagogue, in an odious sense, but the effect is that it will be a monopoly. No other line will start, because it can not compete with the subsidized line; so that instead of promoting shipping and commerce, the reverse will result.

The purpose of this donation is ostensibly to stimulate commerce and give better mail facilities by creating new lines. I reply that the effect will be to distribute the money among the existing lines and give them the power to prevent competition. The general opinion in France to-day is that the bounty system has failed to produce the effect of increasing the shipping trade, and has only succeeded in creating a few large steamship companies, who have monopolized the steamship interests and the whole carrying trade to the exclusion of other lines engaged in the business.

Now I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that whenever coffee is mentioned it is said that these lines to Brazil will bring it so much cheaper. The fact I think is, and in that I am satisfied I am correct, that most if not all of the coffee is brought in sailing vessels. That at least is my understanding.

I say the very lines that were called into existence by these large bounties from France are bankrupt to-day; who will be benefited by a similar bounty here? On what real ground can you excuse this appropriation which will take $4,000,000 from the public Treasury? How can you justify such a proposition before the bar of public opinion. I claim that it would be a gross abuse of our power. I appeal to my party friends; I appeal in the name of the American people whose money we have to take care of; I appeal as one to whom the fortunes of the Republican party are dear; I appeal to you as a Republican who wants to have his party, like Cæsar wanted his wife, to be above reproach; I appeal to you gentlemen that you will not again act as you did in the closing hours of the last Congress; do not allow yourselves to be again intimidated or coerced by threats of a prolonged or extra session into voting for such a subsidy. Assert your manhood and independence. Be not deceived by the siren songs of lobbyists who swarm in the corridors here to button-hole the members. Do not vote the public Treasury away to fill the coffers of Jay Gould and his greedy corporations. And when I mention the name Jay Gould I simply do it because I am informed, and believe, he will be a large beneficiary of this appropriation; because he is one of the main stockholders of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. Listen to the voice of the American people, and not to the insincere pretenses of a handful of millionaires. I long, Mr. Chairman, for the purer atmosphere and the cool breezes of my State. I would like to go home and be with my family and friends in Wisconsin, provided our business was done here. I know the people also would breathe easier had we adjourned already. [Laughter.] But, sir, ardent as my desire is for the session to close, I for one will not be induced by any pretext, under any circumstances, to vote for this misappropriation of public money.

Mr. BUCHANAN. You will fight it out on that line if it takes all summer?

Mr. GUENTHER. Yes, sir. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. If it is proposed to make the close of the session conditional on the passage of this amendments, if it is proposed to make it a question of physical endurance, I am physically not very strong myself, but I for one am willing to stay rather than yield, rather than to be coerced into submission to the dictates of these hunters for subsidies and would-be plunderers of the people's Treasury. I for one am determined to stay here, and, in the language of that immortal hero, as suggested by my friend, stay and fight them if it takes all summer. [Great applause.] If I have any time remaining I reserve it.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the gentleman will bear me witness there has been no suggestion on the other side of any such coercion as he has spoken of.

Mr. GUENTHER. I have heard many suggestions.

Mr. BURROWS. There has been no such suggestion in the debate. The gentleman seems to have drawn on his imagination.

Mr. GUENTHER. I do not make statements unless I have something more substantial than imagination to draw upon.

Mr. BURROWS. Has the gentleman from Wisconsin any time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute left.

Mr. BURROWS. I will state to the Chair I suppose it is understood that one hour and a half have been occupied on this side. How much time has been used on the other side?

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand from the Chair we have had three hours.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] had expected to speak to-day, but is ill and unable to be here this afternoon. I had expected him to follow; and it will be impossible now for anyone on this side to go on.

Mr. BLAND. I do not think this subsidy question should take up all the time of the House. Why not have a vote upon it?

The CHAIRMAN. If no gentleman proposes to continue the debate further or to make a motion the Chair will put the question on concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think there is some misunderstanding. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] concedes that the remaining time of this day should be occupied by that side of the House.

Mr. BURROWS. But I stated that it was expected that Mr. PETERS, who is ill, would talk half an hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. I shall insist if gentlemen on that side are not ready to go on gentlemen on this side shall not suffer by it. We do not propose to let gentlemen on the other side conclude this debate. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BURROWS. I have given a reason for our not proceeding, which ought to be satisfactory—the sickness of a member of the committee who expected to speak this afternoon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not complaining that the gentleman is sick, but the understanding was that this should occupy two days. The practice is to alternate, and we have certainly done our share up to this time.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Senate amendments to the Post-Office appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, requested the return of the resolution of the Senate of May 17, 1886, agreeing to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1227) granting an increase of pension to William P. Squires.

It also requested the return of the bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-second sections found to be mineral lands.

It also announced the passage of a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 7207) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1886, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at South Pass of Mississippi River; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 79) for the relief of William L. Dunlop, trustee.

It further announced the passage of bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 127) for the relief of H. K. Belding;

A bill (S. 976) for the relief of certain officers of the Signal Service;

A bill (S. 1339) to amend the police regulations of the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 1393) to extend the limits of port of Portland as a port of entry; and

A bill (S. 1587) in relation to the trustees of the Reform School of the District of Columbia.

It also announced the passage of concurrent resolutions providing for the printing of 15,000 additional copies of the reports of the South American Commission and 5,000 additional copies of the report of Mr. Menocal on the interoceanic canal; in which concurrence was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 19, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

POTOMAC RIVER BRIDGE AT ANALOSTAN ISLAND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia; which was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, May 18, 1886.

SIR: In response to the Senate resolution of May 3, the commissioners beg to inform the Senate that preliminary estimates of the cost of a bridge across the Potomac to connect the city of Washington with the Arlington National Cemetery have been prepared.

The line of the bridge is approximately that of New York avenue prolonged, and, traversing Analostan Island, leads directly to the main gate of Arlington.

As the Senate resolution conveys no intimation of the character of the proposed structure nor of the probable uses to be made thereof, the commissioners are without a guide in these respects.

Alternative estimates have been made for an iron trussed structure for the entire width of the valley and for a combined truss and embankment construction.

The general features of both are for a roadway of 20 feet in width with two 6-foot sidewalks, open spans of 210 feet each, and a draw-span over the channel of 250 feet, with center pier. The bottom chord of the bridge is 20 feet above mean low water.

Plan A includes 1,300 linear feet of trussed bridge as above proposed, with 2,100 feet of embankment; total cost, $350,000. If the roadway be reduced to 18 feet and the sidewalks be omitted, the cost would be $300,000.

Plan B is for a trussed iron structure throughout, with no embankment. The estimated cost is $460,000. With the reduced dimensions as under subplan A the cost would be $360,000.

The constructions above estimated for are about the cheapest that it would be at all worth while to consider. Of the two, plan A is the cheaper and probably the more advantageous, if the embankment across Analostan Island and the marsh beyond be not considered injudicious.

If more ornamental structures of greater capacity be contemplated the cost will depend upon the plan adopted.

In addition to the above the Senate resolution requires an estimate of the cost of converting the plateau belonging to Arlington into a parade-ground. In the absence of detailed surveys, for which no provision exists, it is roughly estimated that the cost of conversion as indicated may be placed at about $100 per acre, which for the 200 acres in question would aggregate $20,000.

Very respectfully,

W. B. WEBB, President.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia if there be no objection.

Mr. DAWES. I should think it had better go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator so move?

Mr. DAWES. I think it should be referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAWES. It relates to a matter before the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of William Webster, of Washington, D.C., praying Government aid in furtherance of his claims against Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of Mrs. Louisa Avery, formerly postmaster at Tallahassee, Fla. The petitioner prays for the adjustment and payment of the difference of salary allowed by Department circular No. 1223, November series, 1884, under the terms of the act of March 3, 1883, which she alleges has been denied to her by the action of the Postmaster-General. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I also present a preamble and resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Jacksonville, Fla.; which was read, as follows:

Whereas the board of trade has been informed that a resolution has been introduced into the United States Senate looking to the forfeiture of the land granted to the Florida Railway and Navigation Company: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the Jacksonville Board of Trade that it would be to the interest of the State of Florida to grant further time for the completion of said railroad, and that the land granted to said company by the United States should not be forfeited, as this board has perfect confidence that the said railroad will carry out in good faith the purposes of its original charter.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the secretary to the Senators and Representatives in Congress.

In presenting this petition I desire to say that I ask its respectful consideration by the Committee on Public Lands and by the Senate. I have presented a large number of similar petitions from citizens of the State of Florida, for which I also ask the most careful consideration. I am myself opposed to the action prayed for by these petitioners.

The petition in effect asks Congress to extend a railroad grant which expired in 1866 and to re-enact it. This action by Congress would in my opinion substantially be to recognize and give its approval to about $15,000,000 or $16,000,000 of fictitious securities in the shape of watered stock and fictitious bonded indebtedness placed on this railroad property above either its original cost or the price paid for it by the persons now holding it.

It would be for Congress to give its approval to the methods and practices by which $3,000,000,000 of fraudulent and fictitious securities have been put upon this country in defiance of law and without the consent of the taxing power, and by which an annual tax of between two and four hundred millions of dollars is imposed on the labor and industries of the country without the authority of law, but in the forms of law, and with a certainty and a relentless power which will require the greatest efforts on the part of the people to prevent and overcome—a tax on locomotion and transportation paid by every man, woman, and child; a tax equal in amount and more oppressive than the entire taxation required for the support of the Federal Government, with its great army of pensioners, all to pay the interest on fraudulent and unreal securities, issued without consideration, and made operative through the connivance and permission of the tribunals charged by the people with the protection of the public and the just enforcement of the law.

It asks an imposition of between five and eight hundred thousand dollars of annual taxation upon the people of Florida in the shape of transportation to pay the interest upon these fictitious securities; and it further in effect asks that it be put in the power of this railroad company or of those who hold the fictitious securities to take from the settlers upon the public lands in the State of Florida between a million and a half and two million dollars as a contribution to the great property which they have already accumulated by gratuities from the United States and the State.

The railroads constituting the Florida Railway and Navigation Company are the Florida Railroad, which sold in 1866 for $320,000, payable in its bonds at 20 cents in the dollar; the Pensacola and Georgia Railroad, which sold in 1869 for $1,400,000, of which about $900,000 was paid in bonds bought at 30 and 40 cents, and which was again sold about 1880 subject to a lien of about $900,000; the Florida, Atlantic and Gulf Central Railroad, which was sold in 1879, I think, for about $120,000, payable in bonds at 20 cents in the dollar, with about 120 miles of new road. This property, the trustee and the receiver testify, is now bonded for $18,080,000. It produces a gross income of $1,000,000 annually, and is subject to a fixed interest charge of about $450,000. We are therefore confronted with the question on which the Senate lately acted in the interstate-commerce bill, which the Senate passed by a vote of 44 in favor of the bill and 4 against—the question which of all others now menaces the country and oppresses the people, increasing the cost of living and depressing the business of the country, which has deprived a million of men of employment and made hundreds of thousands of starving women and children.

The paramount and overshadowing question, How shall Congress and the States so legislate as to prevent the $3,000,000,000 of watered and fictitious bonded debt, with its three or four hundred millions of annual tax levied on the people of this country, from remaining a perpetual and crushing burden on all the industries and labor of the people? is met by this petition of the board of trade, requesting that this fifteen millions of indebtedness shall be approved by Congress and rewarded with a gift of the public land by the renewal of a railroad grant which expired twenty years ago, and with the power to demand from the settlers on the public land of the United States from one and a half to two millions of dollars as the price of their homes.

I will print, as a part of these remarks, the following extracts from the able speech of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] on this subject, delivered in the Senate yesterday:

No honest man can read the testimony on the files of the two Houses of Congress, taken by the various committees who have from time to time investigated the subject, without a feeling of profound indignation and disgust, that a vital necessity to the whole country, like our great railroad system, should be an instrumentality in the hands of a few individuals for the systematic robbery of all the people of the country. That it is so used is not a matter of conjecture, nor does it rest on the assertion of enemies of railroad corporations, but is shown by the testimony of some of the ablest railroad men and experts in the United States, some of whom for years have been engaged in the highest branches of railroad administration. Mr. Henry V. Poor, the author of Poor's Railroad Manual, to whose testimony before the Senate committee I have already adverted, and who will be accused by nobody of unfriendliness to railroad corporations, in his statement estimates that of the capital stock, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness issued by the railroads of the United States, amounting at the close of 1883 to $7,495,471,311, at least $2,000,000,000 represents what is known as "watered stock."

* * * * * * *

In 1830 there were only 23 miles of railroad in operation in the United States. For more than two hundred and fifty years this country has been developing, and its millions of hardy, enterprising, and thrifty people laboring and struggling and saving up wealth. It is too heavy a draught upon the credulity of the country to expect it to be believed that the comparatively few persons who have for fifty years only been building and operating railroads have honestly acquired one-fifth part of all the accumulations of value in the country. That they claim to have done so is certain. That the figures at which they value railroad property, stocks, &c., sustains that claim is equally certain. That they tax the people for transportation on a basis established for the purpose of paying interest in the shape of dividends on the amount thus claimed to be railroad values is unquestionable, and that at least one-half, and most probably a considerably larger proportion, of the alleged values is fictitious, bogus, "watered stock" does not admit of a doubt or question.

"Watered stock" means stock created by a stroke of the pen, costing nothing except the paper and ink used in making it, and representing not a penny of actual capital or value, but which is added to the actual, bona fide stock which represents capital, and counted as part of the cost of the railroad, and freight and passenger rates are fixed high enough to pay dividends upon the whole, fictitious as well as real. Through this device honest stockholders are defrauded and the people compelled to pay nearly double rates for transportation, because the corporations claim the right to fair profits or dividends on the entire stock, "watered" as well as real. This watered stock, representing nothing but the wrong which created it, stands on the books of the railroad corporations, in the stock markets, everywhere, on the same footing with stock honestly representing cash value, draws the same dividends, and commands the same prices, and the people are taxed in transportation charges to pay interest on it as if it represented full and honest cash face value.

Through this process of fraudulently watering railroad stocks a perpetual mortgage for an amount greater than the entire national debt when at its greatest figure after the war, before its reduction was commenced, has been placed upon the industry of the country, exacting from every person and every pound of freight carried its daily and hourly tribute. In order to give some idea of the methods through which stock-watering is performed I here read from the testimony of Mr. Simon Sterns, representing the Board of Trade and Transportation of New York, given before the Senate committee, and found on pages 78 and 79 of the volume of testimony.

Mr. F. B. Thurber, of New York, on pages 274 of his testimony, said:

That if this stock which had previously been largely watered had not again been watered "the public would have been $100,000,000 richer and Mr. Vanderbilt and his associates $100,000,000 poorer." "Overcapitalization" is the polite designation for this method of plundering the people.

The same gentleman in his testimony said: "Excessive capitalization operates as a mortgage upon the industry of the country whenever the power exists to impose rates for transportation which will yield dividends on watered stock." The power to impose rates exists universally with the corporations, except in the rare cases when competition controls them. Pooling, which is now the order of the day among railroads, and is utterly destructive of competition, gives to railroad corporations power to exact full dividends upon their fictitious watered stock. It has become an axiom in railroad administration that when combinations are possible competition is impossible.

Corporations which, in violation of official trust, defraud honest stockholders and plunder the public in amassing princely fortunes for themselves. It is to give value to this fraudulently issued stock and buoy it on Wall street, that dividends on it are forced by double charges on the public for transportation, and by cutting down the wages of labor. In order to keep up the value of stock the charges must be sufficient to pay interest on the bonds outstanding, because that must be paid first, and then to pay the dividends on the stock, so that the stock and bonds constitute the basis for transportation charges.

Mr. Joseph, of Iowa, a witness before the committee, stated that the aggregate of the bonded debt and stock of the railroads of Iowa amounted last year, according to official reports, to $258,000,000, while the property of the roads upon which they paid taxes was assessed at only $30,000,000, and that the annual net profit of the roads was within a fraction of 5 per cent. on the first-named amount, or about $12,000,000, which is exactly 40 per cent. net profit on the amount they assess for taxes; and it will be remembered that this profit was made during a period of unparalleled depression. I read from the testimony, page 1036:

"Senator HARRIS. Did I understand you correctly when I understood you to say that the stock and bonded debt amounted to $258,000,000 on your railroads?

"Mr. JOSEPH. Yes, sir.

"Senator HARRIS. And that the assessment for taxation was $30,000,000 in the aggregate?

"Mr. JOSEPH. Yes, sir.

"Senator HARRIS. A difference of $228,000,000?

"Mr. JOSEPH. The assessment is about one-ninth of the sum on which they draw revenues."

The assessment for taxes to the State about one-ninth of the sum on which their rates and charges are fixed and on which they draw revenues. This statement as to the Iowa roads is believed to be equally true as to the proportion of "water" in railroad stocks throughout the Southwest.

I could multiply quotations to the same effect indefinitely from the mass of testimony before the Senate, but will not consume more time to do so. It is sufficient to say that all the testimony concurs in attributing to overcapitalization, or, in other words, to fraudulently issued stock and bonds known as "watered stock," all the difficulties surrounding railroad administration, producing, as it does, a war between the people and the railroad corporations, the former trying to protect themselves from extortionate rates sought to be enforced by the latter for the purpose of making dividends on fictitious capital, or, to speak more accurately, on no capital at all.

The mystery as to the mode of accumulating the colossal fortunes which in the last fifteen years have been amassed by leading railroad men is solved under the light of the undisputed facts, which show wholesale pillage of the public in the administration of the great transportation business of the country. These great railroad lines are as necessary to the civilization and commercial, social, and political life of the Republic as blood circulation is to the life of man, and disease, impurity, and taint in the latter is no more fatal to physical health than corruption and dishonesty in the management of the former is to the health of the body-politic. The duty of the government, State and national, is plain. Congress should no longer permit corporations in their own interest to regulate interstate commerce as they now do, to usurp a function vested by the Constitution in Congress, but should itself by law regulate it in the interest of the public in a mode which shall be fair to honestly invested capital. But the chief responsibility and the highest duty rest with the States which have chartered the great railroad corporations. These owe it to themselves, to their people, to the great right of local self-government which needs to be vindicated in this regard, to take hold of this subject in earnest and deal with it as its stupendous importance demands. The power is in their hands to apply the remedy.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE PASSPORT CHARGE.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, transmitting a letter of the Secretary of State, in response to a resolution of the Senate of May 5, relative to charges for passports to American citizens, to report it back and ask that the committee be relieved from the further consideration thereof, and that the message be referred to the Committee on Finance, as it relates to what is practically a tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had directed him to return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands; and also to return to the Senate its resolution agreeing to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1227) granting an increase of pension to William P. Squires.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

A bill (S. 823) granting a pension to Capt. Elihu Jones;

A bill (S. 685) granting a pension to Mary Marsh;

A bill (S. 983) granting a pension to Michael Daly;

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOWEN. I introduce a bill granting a pension to Alfred Cumings, and I wish to state that I accompany it with some papers, one of which is signed by Mr. Cumings himself. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to the fact that the difficulty in the case in the Pension Office was that the identity of the claimant could not be established. It is possible that his signature may be compared with that on the pay-rolls of his company, which the committee will no doubt be able to get by calling on the Department for them, so that the missing link in this man's evidence may be supplied.

The bill (S. 2476) granting a pension to Alfred Cumings was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2477) making an appropriation for the establishment and erection of a military post near the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 2478) granting a pension to John Wines; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2479) granting a pension to Mrs. Adaline P. Loy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 2480) granting a pension to Augustine H. Flood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2481) granting a pension to Robert Hall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

Mr. LOGAN submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide a method for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the morning business is closed and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Calendar is proceeded with I should like to give notice that if it be agreeable to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] I shall ask the Senate to-morrow morning after the routine business is over to take up and dispose of the bill (H. R. 6661) to provide for closing up the business and paying the expenses of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and for other purposes. I desire that the bill shall be disposed of at an early day, and I understand that it will be agreeable to the Senator from Iowa to take it up at an early day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If it be the pleasure of the Senate to consider the bill to-morrow I shall have no objection.

Mr. CONGER. If it is proposed to take up the bill in the morning hour I shall have to object to its being taken up before 2 o'clock. I do not wish by my silence to give any assent to taking up the bill before 2 o'clock.

DAVIDSON DICKSON AND OTHERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 290) for the relief of Davidson Dickson and others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was read yesterday and also the report from the Committee on Claims. The pending question is on the amendment reported from the committee, in line 13, before the name "James A. Ralston," to insert the words "estate of;" so as to read:

To estate of James A. Ralston, $771.25.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. Was not the Staten Island bridge bill the regular order for this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was left on the Calendar undisposed of. The pending bill was under consideration at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEN ISLAND BRIDGE.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 259, being on the Calendar two ahead of the bill which has just been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 259, being the bill (S. 121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road.

Mr. SEWELL. I shall object to the consideration of the bill in the morning hour.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration, notwithstanding the objection. The Senator from New Jersey is apparently now present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 9, after the word "Kill," to strike out the words "at or near Elizabeth, Union County," and to insert "from;" and in line 10, after the word "Jersey," to strike out the words "and the town of Northfield" and insert "to;" so as to read:

That it shall be lawful for the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York, and the Baltimore and New York Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New Jersey, or either of said companies, to build and maintain a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, or Arthur Kill, from New Jersey to Richmond County, New York, for the passage of railroad trains, engines, and cars thereon, and to lay on and over said bridge railway tracks for the more perfect connection of any railroads that are or shall be constructed to the said sound at or opposite said point.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 6, after the word "than," to strike out "thirty" and insert "thirty-two;" and after the word "above," in the same line, to insert the word "mean;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel of the sound at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than 200 feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw; and said spans shall not be less than 32 feet above mean low-water mark, measuring to the lowest member of the bridge superstructure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 1, after the word "plan," to insert the words "and location;" and in line 5, after the word "plan," to insert the words "and location;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That the plan and location of said bridge, with a detailed map of the sound at the proposed site of the bridge and near thereto, exhibiting the depths and currents, shall be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, and until he approve the plan and location of said bridge it shall not be built, &c.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Are the amendments of the committee through with?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I now desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. Will my colleague allow me to ask for the reading of the report in this case?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the following report, submitted by Mr. FRYE February 25, 1886:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road, beg leave to report as follows:

This bill makes it lawful for the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railroad Company and the Baltimore and New York Railroad Company, corporations existing under the States of New York and New Jersey respectively, to construct a railway bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, at or near Elizabeth, N. J., and the town of Northfield, upon Staten Island, New York.

Mr. FRYE. Right there I wish to say that the latitude of the Secretary of War has been increased as to the location of the bridge by an amendment which has been adopted.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report, as follows:

It provides that the bridge shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel of the sound at an accessible and navigable point and with spans of not less than 200 feet in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and that these spans shall not be less than 32 feet above low-water mark measuring to the lowest member of the bridge superstructure. The bill further provides that the plan and location of the bridge shall be submitted to the Secretary of War and receive his approval before it can be constructed.

The committee gave ample opportunity to all parties interested to present their arguments in favor of or against the bill, and, after carefully considering the same, now state their conclusions as follows:

(1) Staten Island Sound, or Arthur Kill, is a tidal water way separating New Jersey from Staten Island, New York. The bill does not locate the site of the bridge, but leaves the same to be determined by the Secretary of War. It was conceded, however, in the arguments before the committee that the point at which the railroad companies desired to construct the bridge, if the site chosen by them should be approved by the Secretary of War, was near the southern border of the town of Elizabeth, where the sound does not exceed 600 feet in width. Some of the opponents of the bill did not object to the construction of the bridge across the sound, but to the location as chosen by the railroad companies. The committee, however, are of opinion that the question of the location of the bridge should be left, as it is left by the bill, to the determination of the Secretary of War, who will doubtless be governed in his action by the report of engineer officers thoroughly familiar with the sound, and who are eminently qualified to determine what is properly a question of engineering.

In almost all the acts of Congress authorizing the construction of bridges over navigable streams we find that the Secretary of War has been invested with the power to locate the bridge and approve the plans thereof, and no sufficient reason has been presented to the committee warranting a departure from this uniform usage.

(2) Staten Island Sound is an important water way connecting Newark Bay and Kill von Kull with Raritan Bay, and along this sound there is carried an extensive commerce. The shores on either side in the main are low, flat salt meadows.

The chief commerce of the sound that is to be affected by the construction of this bridge is that coming from South Amboy, Perth Amboy, and the Raritan River. At South Amboy the Pennsylvania Railroad Company have constructed their extensive coal wharves, and at Perth Amboy are found the large piers of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company. The tonnage from South Amboy, as shown by the report of Major Gillespie, for the year ending June 30, 1884, was 2,308,961 tons, being chiefly coal (see page 754); from Perth Amboy, from the same report (page 754), the tonnage was 2,293,620 tons; this also was chiefly coal. From the Raritan River came, first, the tonnage passing through the Delaware and Raritan Canal, connecting the Delaware and Raritan Rivers, amounting, as shown by that report (page 756), to 1,272,386 tons; and also the tonnage coming from manufacturing and other establishments upon the river and tributaries, and which was carried in small sail-boats or small steamers, and shown in the same report as 409,939 tons.

What proportion of this entire tonnage passes through the Raritan Bay and takes what is known as the outer channel through the Narrows to New York, and what proportion of the same passes through the outer channel and past Sandy Hook and up the coast, the committee have no accurate means of determining; it was, however, conclusively shown to the committee, and indeed admitted by all parties, that the commerce from South Amboy, Perth Amboy, and the Delaware and Raritan Canal, and which passed up the sound to New York Harbor and to ports situated on or near Long Island Sound, was carried almost exclusively in canal-boats and barges. These boats and barges are placed in large tows, sometimes containing, as stated to the committee, 8,000 tons of coal, and drawn by tugs. The canal-boats or barges coming from the Delaware and Raritan Canal are brought down the Raritan River in large tows and pass through the draw-bridge of the Central Railroad of New Jersey at the mouth of the Raritan River. The draw of this bridge gives a clear water way of 200 feet. The opponents of the bill claim that the construction of the bridge would offer serious obstruction to this canal-boat and barge traffic by contracting the width of the channel to two clear water ways of 200 feet each; the committee, however, are of the opinion that the difficulties anticipated by the opponents of the bill will not arise in actual practice. It must be remembered that these canal-boats and barges will readily pass under the bridge constructed 30 feet above law-water mark without the draw thereof being open, and it was shown to this committee that a large proportion of the tugs were provided with smoke-stacks of such a height that they could readily pass under the bridge without the opening of the draw. Moreover, it is a well-known fact that the smoke-stacks of these tugs can be so constructed that they can be lowered while passing under a bridge, and that this form of construction is quite common, if not almost universal, upon the Western rivers, where the boats are frequently required to lower their stacks while passing under bridges constructed without a draw.

The committee call attention to the fact that the bill does not fix the exact height at which the bridge is to be constructed above low-water mark, but prescribes that it shall be constructed not less than 30 feet above the same, leaving to the Secretary of War to determine whether, under all the circumstances, the bridge shall be constructed a few feet higher than the minimum prescribed by the bill. The committee call attention to the fact that very much of this commerce that will pass through this bridge has not only come through the Delaware and Raritan Canal, but has come in tows through the 200-foot draw at the mouth of the Raritan River. The committee are not aware that a draw of greater length than that prescribed by the bill has ever been required by Congressional enactment. The New York and Greenbush Railroad Company's bridge is constructed across the Hudson River, near Albany, with a draw of 170 feet, and above this draw are made up the large tows of canal-boats coming from the Erie Canal and destined to New York, and through it also pass all the large steamers plying between New York and Albany.

The lake commerce of the city of Chicago is accommodated upon the Chicago River, and at least 99 per cent. of the same passes through one draw-bridge and 90 per cent. passes through five draw-bridges. Over the Chicago River there are some thirty-three bridges with draws therein, and none of them, we believe, are of greater width than that provided by the bill. Under the act of Congress approved the 3d day of March, 1883, the construction of a bridge of the New York, Boston and Providence Railroad Company across the Thames River, at or near New London, Conn., was authorized; the location and plans thereof were to be approved by a board of Army and Navy officers designated by the Secretaries of War and Navy. After full discussion this board has approved a plan of a bridge with a draw of substantially the same length as that provided in the bill, and through this draw pass the sound steamers of the Norwich line, and large ocean craft, and the United States war vessels destined to the naval station, which is situated some distance above the bridge. Across the Harlem River in New York bridges have recently been constructed and approved by the engineers of the Army with draws of considerably less width than the one proposed by this bill; and under these bridges and through these draws passes an immense commerce, as well as the large car floats and tows of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad to the High Bridge terminus of that line.

It is a fact well known that there is scarcely a navigable water way in New Jersey which has not been bridged under the authority of the Legislature of that State. The large commerce of the city of Newark, with a population of 150,000 inhabitants, and of its neighboring towns passes through the draws of the numerous bridges across the Newark Bay and the Passaic River, and none of these draws have a width greater than 80 feet, and the extent and value of the commerce and the number of vessels passing through the same is shown by the above-mentioned report of Major Gillespie (page 742). All of these bridges across the Newark Bay and the Passaic River are so low that the draws are required to be opened even for the smallest craft.

The committee are therefore persuaded that the commerce of Arthur Kill can readily pass through a 200-foot draw. It was shown to the committee that there was a limited commerce of small oyster-boats and craft of that kind, but of course these would have no difficulty in passing through this draw-bridge. Very few sea-going vessels pass through the Arthur Kill and only when in tow, and it was not seriously claimed that vessels of this character would be affected by the construction of this bridge.

The committee refer to the fact that a bill similar to this received the unanimous approval of the Senate Committee on Commerce at the last session, and they also refer to and make a part of this report the report of the Secretary of War and the communications of the War Department in regard to the previous bill, which contained provisions substantially the same as the one now in question. They call special attention to the following language of Major Gillespie, of the engineers:

"The proposed clear width of 200 feet on either side of the pivot will be ample to prevent interference with the security and convenience of navigation of Arthur Kill. It is a comprehensive enterprise, which, if successfully carried out, will add greatly to the commercial character of the island and the adjacent shores, and the bridges may be safely authorized to be built under the restrictions of the bill without any detriment to commerce, present or prospective."

In the report of Major Gillespie the Chief of Engineers concurred, and the same was approved by the Secretary of War.

(3) The two corporations which by the bill are authorized to construct this bridge are now controlled by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, which seeks for its traffic an independent outlet upon New York Harbor. This company is one of the large trunk lines, so called, controlling some 3,000 miles of railway, extending to Cincinnati, Louisville, and Saint Louis on the southwest, and Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Sandusky, and Chicago in the north and northwest.

This company desires to use the northern and eastern shore of Staten Island for its terminus; upon these shores there is ample depth of water for the accommodation of the largest sea-going vessels. These vessels can come direct to the piers constructed upon these Staten Island shores and unload their cargoes direct into warehouses, whence the same can be loaded directly into cars for shipmment to their places of distribution. Terminal charges for lighterage from the vessel to the warehouse and again from the warehouse to the railroad will thus be saved. The average cost of lighterage in New York Harbor was stated to your committee at 60 cents a ton. The railroad company also propose to carry their passenger traffic in fast steamers directly from the northern point of the island to their depot near the Battery in New York city, and which is immediately connected with the station of the four elevated railroad lines in New York.

The construction of the bridge will therefore serve a very important public purpose and accommodate a very large amount of interstate and foreign traffic, and will give to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad an independent terminus at New York, and will bring into use for commercial purposes the deep-watered shore of Staten Island, which forms the southern portion of the New York Harbor.

(4) The committee are of opinion that the commerce which passes across such a stream as Staten Island Sound is to be accommodated as well as that which passes along it, and, in the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Escanaba Company vs. Chicago (107 U. S. Reports, page 680), "The object of wise legislation is to give facilities to both with the least obstruction to either." This we think is accomplished by the provisions of the bill. Commerce of the railroad can pass across the sound, commerce of the sound can pass through the draws which are ample for every purpose, and the large proportion of the sound traffic can pass under the bridge without even the necessity of opening the draw and without being obstructed in any substantial degree.

The committee therefore report Senate bill No. 121 with amendments, and recommend its passage as amended.

Since this report was prepared the attention of your committee has been called to resolutions passed by the Legislature of New Jersey touching the authority of Congress in these premises, and in fact denying that authority. They therefore submit their views as to this question. They also annex communications from the Secretary of War.

The committee does not deem it necessary to enter into an extended discussion of the power of Congress to pass acts authorizing the construction of bridges over interstate water ways. This power has been exercised too frequently to be now the subject of serious denial. To cite a single instance, among the statutes enacted by the Forty-seventh Congress there are twenty-four acts in substantially the same terms as the present bill authorizing railroad companies to build bridges over navigable rivers within and between States; hardly a session of Congress passes without similar authority being conferred upon a railroad or bridge company to bridge some navigable stream.

In 1876 the State of South Carolina filed a bill in the Supreme Court of the United States against the State of Georgia and the Secretary of War to prevent the United States engineers from building a crib across one channel of the Savannah River in order to deepen the others. The court dismissed the bill, and in doing so used the following language:

"They (the States before the adoption of the Federal Constitution) had plenary authority to make improvements in the bed of a river, to divert the water from one channel to another, and to plant obstructions in it at their will, but the power to regulate commerce conferred by the Constitution is that which previously existed in the States. The power to regulate commerce confers the control for that purpose to the extent necessary of all the navigable rivers of the United States which are accessible from a State other than those in which they lie; for this purpose they are the public property of the United States, subject to all the requisite legislation by Congress." (South Carolina vs. Georgia, 93 U. S., page 4.)

Again the court said:

"Every structure erected in the bed of a river, whether in the channel or not, would be an obstruction. It might be a light-house erected on a submerged sand-bank, or a jetty pushed out into the stream to narrow the water way, or a pier of a bridge standing where vessels now pass."

It is true that the States retain the power to authorize the construction of bridges across navigable streams, as long as the subject is not regulated by Congress, but the moment that Congress, in pursuance of the power delegated to it by the Constitution, exercises its right to authorize the construction of bridges, State enactments contrary thereto become null and void. This is a doctrine settled by numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and upon which Congress has uniformly acted. In the case of Gillman vs. Philadelphia (3 Wallace, 713) the court, referring to the construction of bridges, uses the following language:

"The States have always exercised this power, and, from the nature and objects of the two systems of government, they must always continue to exercise it, subject, however, in all cases to the paramount authority of Congress whenever the power of the State shall be exerted within the sphere of the commercial power which belongs to the nation."

Again:

"Lastly, Congress may interpose, whenever it shall be deemed necessary; by general or special laws it may regulate all bridges over navigable waters, remove offending bridges, and punish those who shall thereafter erect them. Within the sphere of their authority both the legislative and judicial power of the United States are supreme. A different doctrine finds no warrant in the Constitution and is abnormal and revolutionary."

In a case concerning a license to construct a boom in the Mississippi, the court said, in 1878: "Moreover, the United States, having paramount control over the river, may grant such license if the State should refuse one." (98 U. S., page 409, Patterson vs. Boom Company.) In 1882 the same court said, in the case relating to the bridge over the Ohio River, authorized by both State and the United States, that the act of Congress was "the paramount license for the erection and maintenance of the bridge." (105 U. S., page 479, Bridge Company vs. United States.) The authority to construct the bridge across the Mississippi River from Council Bluffs to Omaha is derived from the act of Congress of February 24, 1871, without any legislation of the State of Iowa authorizing its construction, and the construction of the bridge under this act has been declared legal by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The act of Congress of July 14, 1862 (11 Stat. L., 570), authorized a railroad company to construct the bridge over the Ohio River near Steubenville, and makes void all provisions of the acts of Ohio or Virginia in conflict therewith. This is a notable instance of where Congress authorized a railroad company to construct its bridge over the Ohio River, although the express legislation of Virginia provided that it should not construct that bridge until certain other bridges should be constructed elsewhere. The act of Congress strikes down this restriction of the State Legislature, and gives express authority to the railroad company to construct its bridge in spite of the same.

The committee do not deem it necessary to cite more instances of Congressional action in authorizing bridges, nor to refer at greater length to the numerous decisions of the Supreme Court and circuit courts of the United States, in which this power is recognized as unquestioned.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 27, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter, dated the 8th instant, from the Committee on Commerce, by its clerk, inclosing Senate bill No. 121, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, "to authorize the construction of a bridge across Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road," and requesting that the committee be furnished with such suggestions as may be deemed proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

In reply I beg to invite your attention to the inclosed letter, dated the 21st instant, from the Chief of Engineers, who embodies a report in this matter by Major Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, concurring in his views, and recommending that the height in the clear between the bridge and the water be measured from the level of mean low water, and be made 32 feet, if practicable.

The recommendations of Major Gillespie and of the Chief of Engineers are concurred in.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SAMUEL J. R. MCMILLAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, U. S. Senate.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, U. S. ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference to this office for report of letter from the Senate Committee on Commerce, by its clerk, Mr. J. B. McMillan, dated the 8th instant, inclosing Senate bill 121, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, "to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and establish the same as a post-road," and to state that it was referred to Maj. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, who has returned it with a report, of which the following copy is respectfully submitted.

Major Gillespie's views are concurred in by this office, and in addition it is recommended that the height in the clear between the bridge structure and the water be measured from the level of mean low water, and be made 32 feet, if practicable.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE, New York, January 16, 1886.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report in compliance with first indorsement, Office Chief of Engineers, United States Army, January 14, 1886, on letter from Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, January 8, 1886, referring to Senate bill 121, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, "To authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road."

This is essentially the same as Senate bill 1447, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, upon which reports were submitted from this office under dates of February 28 and April 15, 1884, to which references are respectfully made.

Arthur Kill is about 12 miles long, and is a retired and sheltered water connection, through Kill von Kull, between the Upper Bay of New York and the mouth of the Raritan River. At the proposed site of the bridge the width from bank to bank, between high-water lines, is 625 feet, approximately, and between the 12-foot curves 500 feet; approximately, the depth in the center of the channel being 18 to 19 feet M. L. W. In the northern half of the kill the navigable depth is 13 feet, low stage, and in the south half 15 to 18 feet, low stage; these are the minimum depths arising from small shoals, the maximum depth near Perth Amboy being in excess of 35 feet. By a slight improvement the navigable depth may readily be increased throughout to 20 feet, low stage.

Senate bill 121, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, provides for the construction of a pivot draw-bridge, which shall have a width of span of not less than 200 feet in the clear on either side of the pivot pier, and a height of not less than 30 feet from lower chord to low-water level. These provisions, in my opinion, meet all the demands of the present or future commerce of the kill, and the restrictions contained in section 4 of the bill are ample to secure a location and construction for the pivot pier such as will cause least interference with the existing deep-water channel and at the same time will be least obstructive to the tidal currents.

The construction of the proposed bridge under the provisions of the bill will not injuriously affect any interests over which the Government has control.

G. L. GILLESPIE,
Major of Engineers, Bvt. Lieut. Col., United States Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 7, 1884.

SIR: In returning herewith the copy of bill S. 1447, "A bill to authorize the construction of certain bridges across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill or Kill von Kull, and to establish the same as post-roads," which was referred from the Senate Committee on Commerce for the views of this Department thereon, I have the honor to inclose herewith a report of the Chief of Engineers, dated the 4th instant, embodying a copy of a report upon the subject of said bill by Maj. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, New York, dated the 28th ultimo.

The views presented by Major Gillespie, in which the Chief of Engineers expresses his concurrence, are also concurred in by this Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. S. J. R. MCMILLAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

OFFICE OF CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith (S. 1447) "A bill to authorize the construction of certain bridges across the Staten Island Sound known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as post-roads," referred to the War Department for its views and suggestions from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate of the United States, and thence to this office, and to invite attention to the following copy of the report thereon of Maj. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers.

It will be observed that Major Gillespie sees no objection to the construction of draw-bridges as provided for, but makes objection to spanning the highway in question by a bridge with unbroken spans having the elevation specified in the bill.

[Second indorsement.]

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE, New York, February 28, 1884.

Respectfully returned to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army. That there may be no mistake as to the water way mentioned as "Staten Island Sound," I take occasion to say in the beginning that the navigable channel known by that name is limited exclusively to the narrow and tortuous water course usually called Arthur Kill, which separates Staten Island on the west side from the New Jersey shore, and extends from Elizabethport to Perth Amboy, N. J.

The name Kill von Kull is reserved solely for the connecting passage between Upper New York Bay and Newark Bay, separating Bergen Neck on the north from Staten Island on the south.

The bridges mentioned in Senate bill 1447, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, are proposed to be erected over Arthur Kill, one at or below Elizabethport, N. J., and the other at or above Perth Amboy, N. J.

Arthur Kill is the grand highway for all the local commerce of the several ports and streams on the west side of Staten Island, as well as for the interstate commerce passing south and west through the Delaware and Raritan Canal, which connects the Raritan River at New Brunswick, N. J., with the Delaware River at Trenton, N. J. This canal is one of the principal links of the chain of internal navigation of the Atlantic seaboard. It has a minimum depth of 8 feet throughout, and its annual tonnage is 2,000,000 tons, approximately; less of late years than formerly, owing to railroad competition, though its importance as a water way is not impaired.

The draws which are described in the bill are sufficiently wide to meet all the requirements of commerce along the route over which the bridges are to be built.

I do not approve the spanning of any important navigable highway adjacent to the sea, which is now or may hereafter be utilized by sea-going vessels, by a bridge with continuous spans, even if the bottom chords should be placed so high as 100 feet above high-water mark, except in the rare case of two large and populous cities, where the intercommunication between them over a bridge would be greatly interfered with by frequent and prolonged openings of the draw.

No such condition exists on Arthur Kill, and while the existing depth of water is not sufficient for sea-going vessels of the first class, yet the stream is capable of improvement, and will be improved whenever commerce demands it. For this reason the bridges should be provided with draws. The proposed clear width of 200 feet on either side of the pivot will be ample to prevent interference with the security and convenience of navigation of Arthur Kill.

On the approach to Newark, N. J., from Kill von Kull, the Central Railroad of New Jersey, which crosses Newark Bay, has a draw with a clear opening of 80 feet on either side of pivot; the New York and Newark Railroad, at the mouth of the Passaic River, has one of 65 feet, and the Pennsylvania Railroad, in the city of Newark, has one of 75 feet.

The Central Railroad of New Jersey, whose tracks cross Raritan River near its mouth, on the approach to the canal, after a lengthy controversy with the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company, adopted and built a draw-opening of 200 feet, the same as proposed in this bill.

The main objects to be gained by the construction of these bridges are to give rapid transit around the island to points on the New Jersey shore, to increase the facilities for reaching New York, and to provide means for reaching coal wharves to be built, it is said, by the coal-carrying roads on deep water on the east side of the island.

It is a comprehensive enterprise, which, if successfully carried out, will add greatly to the commercial character of the island and the adjacent shores, and the bridges may be safely authorized to be built under the restrictions of the bill without any detriment to commerce, present or prospective.

The papers are herewith returned.

G. L. GILLESPIE,
Major of Engineers, Bvt. Lieut. Col., U. S. A.

I concur in these views.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,
Chief of Engineers, Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen.

Hon. ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., April 17, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference to this office on the 11th inst. of the letter of Hon. W. P. FRYE, of the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, inclosing S. 1447 "to authorize the construction of certain bridges across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill or Kill von Kull, and to establish the same as post-roads," and certain papers relating thereto, and to state that it was referred to Maj. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, who has returned it with the report of which the following is a copy.

Major Gillespie's views appear to be just and proper, and are concurred in.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER'S OFFICE,
New York, April 15, 1884.

Respectfully returned to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The intent of the act, as I understand it, is to authorize at this time the construction of a railroad bridge over the navigable waters of Arthur Kill, the Secretary of War having the reserved right, in the interest of commerce, to dictate the character and arrangement of the bridge in all its parts.

The petition submitted with Mr. Bonnett's paper has been carefully considered. The east bank of Arthur Kill, on the northern side of Staten Island, extending south to Fresh Kills, is a wide marsh land, with but little variation in its elevation for a distance back from the shore line of over 2 miles. If the lower chord of the bridge proposed to be built near Elizabethport be placed at 135 feet above high water the approaches to the bridge would be over long and high trestle-work, which would have so steep a grade as to make the railroad probably unfitted for giving rapid transit to the towns on the island and on the west bank, or for convenient connection with existing railroads.

The 135-feet contour of the island along the proposed railroad line on the north shore does not extend westward of Factoryville. At the southwestern point of the island the ground is higher than on the north shore; on the ridge above Tottenville the 100-feet contour appears on a single rise, but this is an exception; all the rest of the ground in the vicinity is much lower.

The low character of the land adjacent to Arthur Kill therefore compels, with rapid transit in view, the construction of low bridges; and that they may not obstruct navigation, draws must be provided, the exact width and arrangement of which can be definitely stated only after a careful survey of the water course has been made, including the determination of the strength and directions of the current. A clear width of not less than 200 feet in the channel way, through the bridges provided for in the act, is, with my present knowledge, deemed sufficient for the requirement of the commerce of Arthur Kill, and the projected bridges may, it is thought, be built without interfering injuriously with the flow of the tide, or without increasing the dangers to navigation due to ice which forms in the kill or which is driven there by winds and currents.

The relation of the bridges to the tides, ice floes, and other matters involving the rights of commerce will engage the attention of the examining officers designated by the Secretary of War, after the bridge company shall have presented drawings and specifications of the plans proposed.

The examination will include not only the bridges proper and the necessary width of draws, but their sites and the sites and arrangements of the piers with reference to the navigation of Arthur Kill in all its bearings.

The papers are herewith returned.

G. L. GILLESPIE,
Major of Engineers, Bvt. Lieut. Col., U. S. A.

The letter of the Hon. Mr. FRYE is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN NEWTON,
Chief of Engineers, Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen.

Hon. ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, April 19, 1884.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 10th instant, inclosing bill S. 1447, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, a bill "to authorize the construction of certain bridges across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill or Kill von Kull, and to establish the same as post-roads," together with a petition from Mr. P. Bonnett and other shore-owners, and also returning for consideration in connection with the petition referred to a report, dated the 4th ultimo, from the Chief of Engineers, embodying a report on this bill from Maj. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, I have the honor to invite your attention to the inclosed report of April 17, 1884, from the Chief of Engineers, embodying a supplemental report, dated the 15th instant, from Maj. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, whose views as expressed therein are concurred in by the Chief of Engineers.

The inclosures to your letter are herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman of subcommittee of Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill which I think will commend itself to every member of the Senate. I have not formulated my amendment exactly in the shape I desire to present it, but I will state, first, that I propose to strike out the word "bridge" wherever it occurs in the bill and to insert the word "tunnel." I propose also to strike out all of the second section which provides the machinery by which the draw shall be closed and opened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator propose——

Mr. MCPHERSON. I care nothing about the amendment offered by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator proposes to strike out the word "bridge" wherever it occurs.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I propose to amend the bill according to the copy I have sent to the desk, including the amendments made by the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That it shall be lawful for the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York, and the Baltimore and New York Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New Jersey, or either of said companies, to build and maintain a tunnel under the Staten Island Sound, or Arthur Kill, from New Jersey to Richmond County, New York, for the passage of railroad trains, engines, and cars thereon, and to lay in said tunnel railway tracks for the more perfect connection of any railroads that are or shall be constructed to the said sound at or opposite said point; and in case of any litigation concerning any alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said sound on account of said tunnel, the cause may be tried before the circuit court of the United States of either of said States in which any portion of said obstruction or tunnel touches; and that all railway companies desiring to use the said tunnel shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage over the same, and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof and of all the approaches thereto, for a reasonable compensation to be paid to the owners of said tunnel under and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties in case they shall not agree.

SEC. 2. That any tunnel constructed under this act and according to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said tunnel; and the United States shall have the right of way for postal-telegraph purposes through said tunnel.

SEC. 3. That the plan and location of said tunnel, with a detailed map of the sound at the proposed site of the tunnel and near thereto, exhibiting the depths and currents, shall be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, and until he approve the plan and location of said tunnel it shall not be built; but upon the approval of said plan by the Secretary of War the said companies, or either of them, may proceed to the erection of said tunnel in conformity with said approved plan; and should any change be made in the plan of said tunnel during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, in obedience to the instructions of my State, whose behests I respect, and in behalf of the interests of free and unobstructed commerce upon the water ways of the country, which are the people's ways and their only relief against unjust railroad exactions, I shall vote against the passage of this bill unless properly amended.

The bill now before the Senate is misleading in its title. It should be entitled a bill to destroy water ways in the interest of railways. With all due respect to the honorable committee who reported this bill, and I do respect each and every member of said committee, I venture as my opinion that with all the facts before it there is not another legislative committee of any progressive nation on earth that would for a moment entertain such a proposal as this bill contains. I take it, therefore, the committee have not been given the facts as they exist, and trust that when the facts are stated even the committee itself will agree to the amendments I have offered.

The bill itself proposes to give ostensibly to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad the right to bridge Staten Island Sound, an arm of the sea, and is the sea itself, to an island in front of it, by a structure which when built will of necessity obstruct commerce. The bridge is not for the use of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad solely, but for the use of any and all railroads who desire to use it, and all railroads can and will use it who think they will be benefited by its use. So, therefore, my opposition is not alone to one railroad but to all railroads, except the crossing be by tunnel or a suitable bridge structure that will not impair the navigation of the stream.

New Jersey hails with delight the advent of any and all new railway lines, from whatever source they spring or whatever name they bear, seeking access to the State and the terminal facilities she enjoys. In that State the franchise is free and the liberty to build railroads absolute and unrestricted. Although not first in the advance, at last, however, the iron horse, that great apostle of liberty and enterprise, is given more freedom in New Jersey than anywhere else. No laws more liberal for the construction of railroads can be found upon the statute-books of any State in the Union.

While New Jersey has been more than liberal to the railroad lines that have sought to cross her territory, she has at all times defended her water courses from aggressions of every kind with a force and vigor that would be creditable and profitable for the Federal Government to imitate.

New Jersey has nearly 30 miles of water front contiguous to New York Harbor (including the 12 miles of Arthur Kill), all of which is available for terminal facilities for all the great railroad lines which stretch far and wide over the continent, developing its industries and which seek their outlet at the sea.

The New Jersey shore is the point at which imports and exports meet for exchange. The great steamship lines to and from all parts of the world here meet the vast system of railroads and inland water routes, and cargoes are exchanged with the least possible expense for handling. It was to preserve intact and free from obstruction this Arthur Kill and the Kill von Kull and other great streams that she required that all railroads should gain the consent of her Legislature before the stream could be bridged. It was not so much to prevent the crossings as to control the manner of the crossings.

If Arthur Kill and the Kill von Kull were the property of any European nation it would ere this have expended untold millions upon it, converting it into a ship-canal for vessels of the largest size. Nature has done its full share, leaving it to the hand of man to fashion and improve it to meet the demands of increasing commerce and national development.

The bill authorizes the construction of a bridge over this sound to Staten Island shore at a point where the sound is only 600 feet wide, providing for a center pier in the middle of the stream to accommodate a railroad which desires to cross the stream, follow up the opposite shore, and locate its depot 2 miles above on the same stream, notwithstanding the resulting infinite distress of the water route and two great railroads whose depots are located on the Jersey shore, and all of which are the competitors of the railroad which seeks this legislation.

It is said that Staten Island should have rapid transit, that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad should have the right to establish its terminal on Staten Island if its own and the public interest requires it. In both cases true, very true, and neither the State of New Jersey nor myself will place any obstacle in the way, provided the crossing be made in such manner as not to defeat and destroy a much greater public interest.

It is claimed by some of the ablest lawyers and jurists in the country that Congress has no constitutional right under the circumstances as here presented to authorize the construction of this bridge.

Without affirming or denying the existence of such power in Congress—as the Supreme Court has never recorded its decision in a similar case—I am ready, however, to admit that the tendency of its decisions of late has been in the direction of enlarging the scope of Congressional power, and to this extent restricting the authority of the States even in matters over which the States claimed exclusive control. Even the Senate itself, whose members are the representatives of States, seems to have forgotten the teachings of the fathers, and has already taken gigantic strides toward a centralized government, denying to the States even the control of its municipal affairs.

I need not therefore waste the time of the Senate in discussing the constitutional power to do this thing, but will leave the discussion with others so disposed and better equipped than myself to deal with the constitutional phases of the case. However, let me remind the Senate that the propriety or necessity of a bridge only 30 feet high and having a center pier is not a question for the discretion of the court but for the discretion of Congress. The means or instrumentalities by which the power granted should be executed is a Congressional power and should be exercised with extreme caution.

I am well acquainted with the location and business upon this water way. The 16,000,000 tons which annually pass the sound and Arthur Kill consist of coal, lumber, iron-ore, clay, brick, and all kinds of heavy material used by manufacturing establishments located on the banks of the sound, together with the vast traffic of the rivers and streams which enter into it, all of which have been made navigable by the Government, to wit, the vast traffic of the Passaic and Hackensack Rivers, upon which are located the great manufacturing cities of Newark, Paterson, Passaic, Hackensack, and other towns of less importance as manufacturing centers.

Large smelting works and other important manufacturing industries have been established on the banks of these rivers and streams. Then comes the Elizabeth River, made navigable by the bounty of the Government to the city of Elizabeth; the Rahway River, made navigable to the city of Rahway; the Raritan River, made navigable to the city of New Brunswick, and by internal water communication furnishing an interior water route as far as Pamlico Sound on the south. The vast clay interest, which furnishes material for a large proportion of the pottery manufactured in the United States, is mainly transported through this channel, and reaches the channel through Reesh Kill, Richmond, Woodbridge, Cheesequake, and Whale Creeks, all of which have been dredged and improved by the Government to meet the requirements of this trade. It will thus be seen that the major part of the traffic through this sound is of the coarser and weightier material, which will not bear rail transportation.

The extent and importance of this traffic is simply enormous, employing over one hundred thousand vessels, carrying 16,000,000 tons of products, with an estimated value of over $60,000,000—a tonnage greater than the entire foreign commerce of the port of New York and much greater than the foreign tonnage of Philadelphia and Baltimore combined; and, with the exception of the single article of coal, the tonnage of the sound is greater than the entire tonnage of the six great trunk lines of railway having their termini in New Jersey. It is estimated that over thirty thousand people find employment in the navigation of this natural water way, made by nature's God for man's use, and upon which, together with its feeders, the Government has already expended nearly $1,000,000.

The tonnage of the Suez Canal in 1883, which cost to build over 457,000,000 francs, was less than half the tonnage of the sound during that year. The tonnage of the Detroit River, of which I will speak hereafter, was in 1872 about 9,000,000 tons. Compared with the tonnage of the Erie Canal, consisting of like bulky and weighty products, the comparison stands as follows: Erie Canal in 1885, 5,000,000 tons, or less than one-third of the tonnage of the sound.

Pursuing the comparison further, we find that the estimated tonnage of the Panama or Nicaragua canal, or the interoceanic ship-railway, estimated to cost, severally, from two to five hundred millions of dollars, will be less than the present tonnage upon this sound.

Let it now be remembered that the stream through which this immense commerce passes is an arm of the sea, in short the sea itself. The point at which this proposed bridge is to be built is only 600 feet in width, and in the very middle of the channel a center pier is to be located, upon which the draw is to rest, and the channel is to be restricted 200 feet in width, thereby placing serious restrictions upon the commerce of the stream for the immediate accommodation of a single railway company, which, after allowing said railway its full share of the traffic to New York, will not carry over this bridge one-tenth of the traffic which now passes upon the waters below the proposed bridge. Again, starting from Pamlico Sound on the south, this great internal water way is a direct competitor for almost every mile of said distance with the Baltimore and Ohio system, which seeks by the proposed legislation to cripple the water route.

Again, the Pennsylvania system has its terminal at South Amboy; the Lehigh Valley at Perth Amboy, and the New Jersey Central at Elizabethport, each of which is upon the banks of the sound on the Jersey shore, all of which are competing lines with the Baltimore and Ohio, and any obstruction to their commerce will tend to lessen active competition. In addition to the obstructions stated to the business of rival lines, very extensive manufacturing establishments have been built upon the Jersey shore, with a prospective commerce greater than that of any single railway in the United States. I send to the Clerk's desk, which I wish to have read, a letter from the Standard Chemical Company, whose works are located on the sound, and which contains much valuable information.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF STANDARD CHEMICAL COMPANY,
New York, April 9, 1886.

DEAR SIR: We have in Union County, New Jersey, an extensive investment in land and manufacturing plant on Arthur Kill, which stream forms a part of the channel between Staten Island and New Jersey. This safe and sheltered inland water way has, within the past ten years, made a wonderfully progressive advance in commercial importance. The two drawbacks which in the past have hindered its development were shoalness of water for a certain distance in Newark Bay and narrowness for a mile or so in front of the city of Elizabeth, where in summer there is scarcely room for the crowd of traffic, and where in winter there is a strong tendency for ice to collect and jam.

The United States Government has since 1873 done much to remedy the first difficulty in the way of the profitable use of this channel by excavating through the shoals of Newark Bay a passage 13 feet deep at low water and 400 feet in width, such channel being a necessity for existing traffic. (See report Secretary of War, 1884, volume 2, part 1, page 742.)

In 1879 this dredging work was so far advanced that this company deemed it safe to erect large works just south of Elizabeth. Daily communication with New York is a matter of prime necessity with us, and we note that our business has not been interfered with by ice, except for a few days at a time during the severe cold spells of the winters of 1885 and 1886. The passage of large passenger steamers and heavy tugs with tows breaks up all ordinary ice, and the rapid tidal flow of Arthur Kill disperses this formation in the wide expanse of Newark and Raritan Bays. At times we have done our part in keeping this channel clear by running our own steamer, the Advance, backward and forward from our docks to Newark Bay. We regard with apprehension the favorable report of Senate bill 121, a bill that would authorize the building of a draw-bridge just north of our works where the kill is only 635 feet wide.

Such a structure, even when provided with two openings of 200 feet each, would completely change the character of this water way. At times it would so collect the ice as to render all our efforts to break through of no avail. It would throttle the flow of the tide where it now has to pass through the narrowest section of this extensive channel, and thus create in many places above and below it a shoaling of the water. It would be ruinous to the profitable prosecution of the great towing business that now uses this highway of necessity. It would even seriously impede large vessels in tow from passing safely except at slack-water. Thus our location would be reduced from a situation on a free and unobstructed "arm of the sea" to one scarcely better than upon an artificial dock with tidal gates.

We are surprised that any engineer should pronounce such a bridge equal to the requirements of existing commerce, much more that it should be said that it could "be safely authorized to be built, without any detriment to commerce, present or prospective."

Since the United States Government took away the main obstacle to this remarkable highway—the shoal in Newark Bay—we have located our works upon its shores, occupying about 1,000 feet out of total New Jersey shore front, between Elizabeth and Perth Amboy, of about 12 miles. To this 1,000 feet the privileges of a free and unobstructed navigation have brought an interstate commerce of 25,000 tons per annum. Four other establishments, averaging about the same business that we do, have taken advantage of the same facilities to extend that great commerce that is now centering in the vicinity of New York, and there is every reason to suppose that this entire shore will in the near future be lined with commercial establishments, to which the free use of the water way is the most important condition. Here, then, is a prospective commerce of 1,500,000 tons per annum, far greater than any railway can ever expect to carry across the stream.

We hope that no bill will ever be authorized in Washington, Trenton, or elsewhere that would allow the clear water way of this stream to be reduced to a width of less than 500 feet by any bridge structure, or without having a provision regarding height and width of draw, admitting of safe passage of vessels with lofty masts through the same.

Respectfully, yours,

STANDARD CHEMICAL COMPANY.

Hon. JOHN R. MCPHERSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will now read the statements of Mr. W. T. Meredith, of New York, Mr. D. C. Chase, and Mr. Isaac L. Fisher, president of the Steam and Sail Vessels' Association, all intelligent men, in respect of this matter:

[New York Herald, February 8, 1886.]

BLOCKING THE KILLS—HOW THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO'S BRIDGE WILL AFFECT NEW YORK—A SOURCE OF DANGER AND DELAY—INTERVIEWS WITH VESSEL-OWNERS WHO OPPOSE THE BRIDGE—A RAILROAD'S SELFISH ENTERPRISE.

The general public seems to be entirely ignorant of the inland water way to the south of New York Harbor and its value to the commerce of the country and the people of New York. The Herald lays before its readers to-day some information regarding the navigation of the Arthur Kill Sound, of the disastrous manner it will be affected by the building of the proposed bridge between the Jersey shore and Staten Island.

SECOND ONLY TO THE EAST RIVER.

"The importance of the Arthur Kill Sound to the commerce of New York," said Mr. William T. Meredith, of No. 58 Wall street, "is second only to that of the East River. Arthur Kill Sound carries every year more freight than the combined foreign shipments of Philadelphia and Baltimore. The Clyde lines, the other freight lines to the South, the coal traffic of the Pennsylvania and Lehigh railroads from Perth and South Amboy all pass over this highway. It would be no greater outrage on the commerce of New York to build a cheap spile with a draw across the East River to the north of Blackwell's Island than it would be to block up Arthur Kill Sound with the same kind of structure."

What evidence is there that the spile bridge with a draw would obstruct the navigation of the sound?

"The evidence of the towboat companies," replied Mr. Meredith, "following the water of the south of New York; the reduction of the tonnage of the Raritan Canal by more than one-half in consequence of the building of the Raritan Bridge at the lower end of the Arthur Kill Sound, a structure very similar to that which it is proposed to throw across from New Jersey to Staten Island. Besides this, the common sense of every man teaches him that a bridge so low that a draw is required to admit the passage of vessels is an obstruction in a crowded stream. How would New York get along with a drawbridge across the Hudson 2 miles above the city?"

HOW THE BRIDGE WILL BE BUILT.

Mr. D. C. Chase, president of the Delaware and Raritan Canal Steam Towing Company, was found at his office, No. 129 Broad street. Upon being asked to give his opinion on the present proposed spile-bridge he said: "Already much has been said about the enormous traffic of the stream across which the bridge is to be built. We all know that a bridge of some kind or other is to be constructed, and all that navigators, whether steam lines, oystermen, or traders, want is a bridge that will not interfere with that traffic. Few know that over one hundred thousand vessels a year pass up and down the Arthur Kill Sound. These carry coal, iron, sand, brick, and almost every variety of freight. The trade is very large, there being 13,500,000 tons of freight carried every year. The value of this freight is from $4 to $100 a ton.

"The center pier, constructed of driven spiles," explained Mr. Chase, "is to be 550 feet in length, which, with the cribbing or guards at each end, will probably be 570 feet in all. It is to be about 65 feet in width. The stream at this point is narrow, being only 600 feet from shore to shore. As spile piers are to be built out from both shores, the width of the draw, when open, will be only 225 feet. At the place in question there are strong cross-currents, and the tide runs about 4 miles an hour. Thus a tow coming toward New York loaded with 8,000 tons, not an unusual cargo, and being towed by steam, moves along with the tide at a rate of speed of from 7 to 8 miles an hour. Should the draw be closed or shut in the face of such a tow, as will often be the case, there is no power on earth that can check the loaded boats from sheering into the center pier; and the immense weight forging along at such a great headway will cause the boats to crash up against each other, and not only run a chance of being wrecked, but do considerable damage to the bridge. Any one acquainted with the towing traffic on this stream knows this will be the case, as the stream at the point where the bridge is to be built is too narrow to admit of long tows being turned and checked.

THE REAL POINT AT ISSUE.

"The real point at issue is whether the bridge shall or shall not be such a structure as will leave the navigation of Arthur Kill Sound free. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company propose to build a bridge costing only $350,000, with a draw affording a passage-way 225 feet wide from the center pier to either side, at an elevation of 30 feet above the water. At the point where it is proposed to locate the bridge the sound, though deep, is only 600 feet in width. I have talked with a number of expert bridge-builders on the subject, and there can be no doubt that an expenditure of $750,000 would build a bridge with a single span of 600 feet from shore to shore at a height of 70 feet above the water, and this would leave the navigation of the sound comparatively free. President Cleveland, in his message to Congress, refers to this very question of the construction of bridges over navigable waters.

"Nowhere else in the country would such a bridge be tolerated as the Baltimore and Ohio is now preparing to construct over a great water way for a paltry cost of $350,000. This bridge question seems to be looked upon in New York as only a good joke on New Jersey. But if this cheap draw-bridge be built New York will find it more than a joke against her sister State. It will be an obstruction to her own commerce. Public attention should be directed to the right of the people to demand a structure costing from $750,000 to $1,000,000, and New York should look to it carefully that no bridge across Arthur Kill Sound by act of Congress which will interfere with her commerce, as the proposed spile-bridge with a draw will certainly do, should be constructed.

The whole country should rise against this contemplated outrage. No pier or any superstructure should be built in navigable waters. The Government has already expended $848,000 in removing obstructions in this place, and propose to spend upward of $2,000,000 more for the same purpose. The center pier of itself will be a greater obstruction to navigation than all the obstructions which have been or will be removed. There is no other inland water route from New York to the South and West, and no one State is more interested in this matter than another. The secret is that the Baltimore and Ohio desire to block up the water traffic that they may control the business themselves."

THIRTY THOUSAND NAVIGATORS TO SUFFER.

Mr. Isaac L. Fisher, president of the Steam and Sail Vessels' Association, was next called upon at his office, No. 14 South street. "I have only the interest of the navigator at heart," said he. "I speak for no corporation. The greatest interest of all in this matter is that of the men who earn their bread and butter on the stream of water in question. The number of vessels plying through the Kills is annually increasing. One hundred thousand passed up and down from this city through the Kills and Arthur Kill last year.

"Altogether there are ten thousand different vessels employed in the Arthur Kill traffic. They average three men each; the oyster-boats and vessels carrying bricks employ six to eight hands; the canal-boats about two. Altogether thirty thousand men earn a living on these waters; besides this 30 per cent. of these men carry their families with them. Block up the stream with a bridge at the place selected by the railroad and these men must necessarily suffer. The whole plan of navigation in the sound will have to be changed, thereby casting a heavy burden upon all employed in it. The tugboat men, who must respond for damage to the vessels and cargoes towed, will not take additional risks without additional compensation. The carrier will ask increased rates to meet the increased rates charged. The shippers, in order to protect themselves, must pay increased rates of insurance, for underwriters will advance their rates for the increased risk, all of which must ultimately be borne by the consumer. If granted, this cheap water route so conspicuously mentioned by Colonel Gillespie in his report of 1883 will be ruined, and many thousand men who earn their living upon this stream of water will be driven off, because a single corporation, in order not to change their plans, insist upon choosing a spot that will ruin the sound. The bridge can be built so as not to interfere with the commerce, and it ought to be if built at all.

THE DRAW WILL RARELY BE CLOSED.

"The bridge bill provides," continued Mr. Fisher, "that the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signals, except when trains are passing over it. That section is delusive. When a train is about due that draw would not be turned until the train had passed over it, for all the vessels in the country. In all fairness, how could a vessel running with the tide, and often hampered by the fogs prevalent thereabouts, avoid colliding with the bridge under such conditions. It is so at every railroad drawbridge, and it is that which makes them so objectionable and dangerous. For the safety of the traveling public alone, they should all be built without a draw, especially where it is as practicable as in this case. I honestly believe that the draw in this bridge built as proposed will be open seven-tenths of the time, because the work that is now done in bulk will of necessity be divided in many parts."

What scheme, then, do you suggest for bridging the Arthur Kill? was asked by the reporter.

"Let the railroad people move below Morss Creek, but 4,500 feet, to a spot known as Buckwheat Island, where the current runs true and fair, the center abutment being placed on the island and the bridge constructed 70 feet above high-water mark, so that all vessels can pass under the span."

And Buckwheat Island——

"Yes, of course. Mr. Wiman's statement has been read that the island is only 25 feet square, while as a matter of fact it contains over 2 acres, being 600 feet in length and 160 feet in width, these figures being based upon the sworn statement of the engineer of the riparian commission."

THE OYSTERMEN'S OPINION.

The reporter then followed the water's edge and talked with over twenty owners of oyster-boats and their captains. They all seemed to be aware of the trap that was about to be sprung on them. One of the oldest captains said: "We have only recently learned that the sound was to be blocked by driven spiles. The bridge people had better build a dam across Arthur Kill and be done with it. If nature had placed such an obstruction in the middle of the channel at the point suggested the Government would have been obliged to remove it long ago. The gist of the thing is that the bridge is not to be built so as not to interfere with commerce, but commerce is to be regulated so as not to interfere with the bridge. Congress, as a rule, seems to be down on American commerce, and is going now to let an Englishman block us up worse than ever."

Mr. William P. Clyde, No. 35 Broadway, said: "I have no objection to a proper kind of bridge across Arthur Kill, but if the stream is blocked up with spiles there will be trouble. More I decline to say." From an authentic source it is learned that the Clyde lines carry $65,000 of freight daily through Arthur Kill Sound. In all $5,000,000 of freight is carried by the steam lines every month.

WHAT COAL SHIPPERS SAY.

Messrs. Berwind, White & Co., No. 55 Broadway, are the largest miners and shippers of bituminous coal in this country. Last year 600,000 tons of their coal was brought through Arthur Kill Sound. Mr. Berwind said: "We have felt that the bridge must come, but we are strongly opposed to one with a draw. It should be at least 70 feet above the surface of the water."

Capt. Henry Hoffman, the superintendent of the harbor work of Berwind, White & Co., said: "The proposed bridge is going to do incalculable damage to the commerce of New York—far more harm than it will do to Jersey. This city is the great central shipping point. I know some of the bridge builders, and they say it is to be built of spiles driven in the center of the channel. This will practically block up the sound. Both the sailing and steam traffic will be disastrously affected. The fleets of oyster-boats can not beat through a draw against a head wind. They will lose days of time every year. The spile pier in winter will create ice, and catch enough to block the draws. As the sound is now we have the greatest trouble with ice for several months every year. There are thousands of men who make a living on the sound because it is now open; but shut it up, as is contemplated, and the poor man, of course, goes by the board. As far as the coal traffic is concerned, it is impossible to bring the coal to the city as cheaply or as safely as through Arthur Kill. When we are forced by the ice to go outside of Staten Island we have to load our boats with one-fourth less coal, and the danger is increased four hundredfold. When east winds prevail we do not dare to make the outside route."

A GREAT EXPENSE TO NAVIGATORS.

How about the tows of coal coming to this city?

"The usual tows consist of from thirty to forty boats. I have seen forty-eight boats in one tow. Each boat is loaded with 300 tons of coal. Thus a tow of thirty-five boats is laden with 10,500 tons of coal. According to the weather and tides, from one to three tugs are used. The boats are four abreast and string out a great length. The line from the tow to the tugs is about 120 fathoms, say 720 feet. This length of line is necessary. It will be impossible to get such tows through the draw, because the boats sheer and swing in the cross current where the bridge is to be built. Extra tugs will have to be located there to assist the regular tugs in getting the tow through the draw. The expense will be greatly increased, and, of course, prices will have to be advanced. The additional expense between a draw-bridge and one to span the Kill will be but a flea-bite to what the navigators will have to expend yearly if the channel is blocked up with spiles. These are the facts, and no one can truthfully contradict them."

Again. The State of New Jersey is the owner of the riparian right of nearly 12 miles of water front from Elizabethport to Perth Amboy, having a present value of $10 per front foot and a prospective value almost incalculable, the proceeds of which are pledged to the school fund of the State, and whose value would be vastly decreased by the proposed bridge structure. In the judgment of many prominent gentlemen—whose judgment in these matters is superior to my own—considering the pecuniary interests the State has in these lands, it could better afford to build a tunnel at its own cost and expense and present it to the railway companies desiring to use it than to suffer the loss which the proposed bill will entail.

It is estimated that 95 per cent. of all the coal distributed through the New England States is transported by boat through Long Island Sound, a large proportion of which first passes through Staten Island Sound. Although the coal fields have direct communication by rail with New England, the railways have not been able to compete successfully with the cheap water transportation to the New England ports. Any obstruction to this water commerce is an additional charge upon coal products to all points east of New York.

This proposed bridge is to have a center pier 580 feet in length parallel with the channel. And this long center pier is the very thing which the mariner so greatly dreads. Any Senator who has crossed the East River between New York and Brooklyn when the tide begins to ebb can form an approximate idea of the force of the current through the narrowest part of this stream again narrowed down to 400 feet by the bridge structure. The tide will run through this narrow water way (now like a mill-race) with increased velocity, making navigation very dangerous if not well-nigh impossible.

The present method of navigation in the sound is by long tows of thirty or forty boats, each containing 300 tons, more or less, drawn by one or two steamboats of great power. These boats enter the kills at Raritan Bay, and start upward when the tide begins to flow, having the assistance of the tide or slackwater until they reach Long Island

Sound. In the opinion of those who navigate the sound, by reason of the center pier of the bridge or the approaches thereto in this tortuous stream, with long, snake-like tows, it would be necessary to use the ebb tide instead of the flow, thereby increasing the cost and delay in navigation more than 100 per cent. As explained by one mariner, a steamboat would be required at the rear end of the tow to steer it through the passage. Another says, if running with the tide and the draw be not open, as will be often the case, these frail and heavy-loaded canal-boats would be forced against the bridge and with certainty be wrecked. He even predicts that the stream itself will be absolutely closed at times by reason of sunken wrecks.

In proof of this he cites the conditions which existed at the Raritan bridge when first built, when the attempt was made to pass the draw at an ebb tide which was followed by the wreck of many boats. The practice now is to anchor the tows above the bridge, at great loss of time, and go through the draw against the tide. They then pass into Arthur Kill and approach the proposed bridge with the conditions exactly reversed. They must then anchor again until the tide changes, or take the chances of safely passing the pier, and that, too, in a current much stronger than at the Raritan bridge.

Again, if an upward-bound tow should anchor below the bridge for the reason stated, all commerce in the opposite direction would necessarily be impeded, for the stream is too narrow at this point to permit them to pass safely.

Again, the traffic over the railroad owning this proposed bridge, consisting of passenger and freight trains, will necessarily be very large, and the draw will of necessity be closed a great portion of the time. It takes several minutes to open and close the draw. It is plain, then, that this wealthy railroad corporation, secure in its power by its being given control of the bridge, can not do its own business without disregarding its obligations toward its weaker competitor, a part of whose rights it has already taken away under the protection of the law and obstructs its operations. With the incessant passage of trains vessels must be delayed for hours, time which they can not make up, and which must prove a serious loss to men who are not able commonly to bear it.

The only question the committee seem to have considered is not whether the bridge will seriously interfere with commerce, but whether commerce shall be regulated so as not to interfere with the bridge.

To illustrate further, over one hundred thousand vessels annually pass through the sound, or three hundred and thirty vessels every twelve hours. The trains of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad alone (if no other road avails itself of the privileges the bill confers), if equal to the present business of the Pennsylvania line (and it would scarcely be willing to concede it to be less), would require to pass over the bridge over three hundred trains per day, or say two hundred trains within the twelve working hours by water. Allowing fifteen minutes to both open and close the draw, it would require each working day to be fifty hours long to adjust the draw alone, to say nothing of the time required in passing boats or trains through or over the draw, and to say nothing of the increasing commerce required by 12 miles of new manufacturing enterprises which would otherwise soon locate on the shores of the sound. Therefore, for the reasons I have stated, any attempt to bridge this sound other than by a bridge sufficiently high to permit the commerce to pass under it, or by a tunnel underneath it, is a mistake so heinous that it approaches a crime.

The proposed bridge is to be 32 feet above the low water, and is to cost $300,000. A tunnel can be made 32 feet below the surface of the water, the bed of the sound being solid sandstone, making the grades precisely the same, for the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, and even four hundred thousand has been named as its cost. Through this tunnel, if properly constructed, could pass without interruption all the commerce, present and prospective, to and from Staten Island for a hundred years to come. The tunnel proper would be scarcely as long as this Capitol building, it being only 600 feet from shore to shore; and the approaches could be open, as the shores are nearly on a level with the water. A bridge 70 feet high and to span the stream without draws would be somewhat more expensive because of the approach thereto on the Jersey shore. However, the question of expense should have no place in this controversy, for no railroad should be permitted to cross that stream except above or below the waters, so as not to interfere with its immense commerce.

In a newly settled country the natural water courses are the only highways available for heavy transportation. As population increases and the country is developed railways are built, and, for a time, they can do all the business required, thus apparently superseding water transportation altogether; but as the wealth and density of population still further increase the necessity for water transportation again asserts itself. So true is this, that now on all sides we find a cry raised for the improvement and greater use of water ways. The necessity for paying increased attention to our inland navigation has been forced upon the public in this country by the combination which railway companies have managed so skillfully to arrange and work for their exclusive benefit. It is not in this country alone, however, that a tendency to revert to the older means of transit is noticeable. Throughout the world of commerce the desire for more direct means of conveying goods in bulk prevails.

By the cession of Alsace and Lorraine France lost the connection between the northern tributaries of the Rhone and the Rhine, which were united at Strasburg. She set to work without delay to reunite these two lines of communication by a new canal constructed on their side of the Vosges, the estimated cost of which was sixty-five million francs. This work must now be complete or drawing toward completion. Even the Russians have been at work converting St. Petersburg into a seaport by a canal 20 miles in length. At the mouths of the Danube and the Mississippi great improvements have been carried out with marked success, giving to the Danube 20 feet of water in place of 9 feet, and increasing the low-water depths of the Mississippi from 8 feet to 30 feet, with the result that the exports from New Orleans have increased many fold. Manchester is about 40 miles from Liverpool, with six lines of railway connecting the two cities, yet it is proposed to connect the two cities by a ship-canal to cost $40,000,000, as the numerous railway lines are deemed insufficient to transport economically heavy and bulky merchandise. In this connection I desire to read a statement by Maj. W. R. King, one of the ablest of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army:

This is evident from the experience in older countries, for although we are, in our own estimation, a wonderful nation, we are not exempt from the laws of nature, and will probably obey "manifest destiny" about as others have done before us, and we are not so wise but that we may profitably take lessons from their experience. France, for example, with an area about four-fifths as large as our State of Texas, and a population thirteen times denser than that of the United States, has 18,000 miles of railway, or about 1 mile of railway to 11 miles of territory, while the United States have only 1 mile of railway to 29 miles of territory.

Notwithstanding these facts, and the enormous strain upon her finances for war expenses and indemnity, France is expending sums on her water ways that would make our short-sighted economists howl with alarm.

For rivers she proposes to expend	$13,200,000
For canals	142,600,000
For harbors	20,000,000
Making in all	175,800,000

to be expended in the immediate future for these improvements; a sum larger than all that has been expended for rivers and harbors by the United States since the foundation of the Government. This last, including all unexpended balances, amounts to only $136,112,576, and if we include the $31,621,423, which covers all that has been expended by States and private corporations for river improvements, so far as can be ascertained, the amount would still be only $167,134,000, or $8,000,000 less than this one appropriation by the French.

Germany affords another excellent example of how river navigation ought to be developed. With an area almost equal to that of France, and only one seventeenth part as great as that of the United States, she has fifteen times our density of population, and a mile of railroad to every 9 square miles of territory, instead of 1 to 29 as we have. She finds it advantageous, however, to expend far greater sums for river improvements than the most enthusiastic advocate of internal improvements would think of expending on our rivers. On one stream, not as large as some of the branches of the Tennessee, say the Holston or Clinch, she has expended $20,000,000, and I am informed that a cable-towage company on one of these rivers, which is too rapid for ordinary navigation, has a chain cable 100 miles long, which enables boats to make regular trips according to schedule and carry freight at about half a cent per ton-mile, for short as well as for long distances. This towage company pays 6 per cent. dividends on its capital stock, which is considered a good investment in that country.

Among the advantages of river improvements may be mentioned:

1. They furnish means for the transportation of heavy and bulky commodities, such as coal, iron-ore, scrap and pig iron, stone and timber, which often will not pay the cost of transportation by rail.

2. They keep in check the grasping tendencies of railway companies by controlling freight rates and facilities.

Now, sir, this proposed legislation is based entirely upon the request of the parties interested, and the propriety of which is supported solely upon the opinion of Major Gillespie, of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, who seemingly never resists the plans and purposes of powerful and wealthy corporations. A reference to Major Gillespie in 1884, February 28, exhibits a want of knowledge in the performance of his duties, touching the needs and requirements of commerce, truly amusing. The bill then pending was for two railroad bridges, similar to the one now proposed, to be located one at each end of Arthur Kill. As Arthur Kill is the nearest and the necessary outlet for the great floods of ice from a part of New York Bay, the Kill von Kull, Newark Bay, the Hackensack and Passaic Rivers, together with the Rahway and Elizabeth Rivers, this ice floe would be forced between the two bridges and effectually blockade the sound. And yet he declared these two bridges no detriment to commerce, present or prospective. In 1886 he again reported, in a modified and guarded form, and concludes as follows:

The construction of the proposed bridge under the provisions of the bill will not injuriously affect any interests over which the Government has control.

With the exception of the report of Major Gillespie, there nowhere appears the opinion of any Government or other engineer in support of the position taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey will pause for a moment. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, 2 o'clock having arrived.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I think I can finish in a few minutes what I desire to say on this point.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Jersey may be permitted to finish.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. MCPHERSON. In direct contradiction, however, to the reasoning and conclusions of Major Gillespie we have the statements and opinions of several other engineers, civil and military, touching this subject. I desire to read a statement of Maj. A. B. Burr, United States Government engineer, in charge of Raritan River improvements, whose long experience with the commerce of these waters would appear to make him a competent authority on this subject:

In regard to the proposed building of a railroad bridge across Arthur Kill, between Staten Island and New Jersey, this proposed railroad bridge is to be built over the existing channel, which passes Elizabethport, runs between Staten Island and New Jersey, and empties into Raritan Bay. The bill introduced is for a bridge to extend from Elizabethport to Staten Island, with a center pier 500 feet long parallel with the channel, having a draw 200 feet wide. To build such a bridge at this point at least 300 feet of the water inclosed between these shores will be obstructed by the piling or piers, which will have to be driven or built to support the road-bed. Arthur Kill is very narrow, only 600 feet wide; is one of the most important highways for commerce in the vicinity of New York Harbor.

The channel is used by all the vessels which transport the commerce originating at Elizabethport, and also by all vessels, steamers, boats, barges, and tows which go to and come from the many rivers tributary to Arthur Kill, or which pass from New York Harbor southward, through the Delaware and Raritan Canal, which with the Raritan River is the connecting link of interstate commerce, between States south of New Jersey and those east. The annual tonnage of the canal alone at one time amounted to 5,500,000 tons; it is now diminished to 1,800,000 tons on account of shoals in the Raritan River and the unfortunate delay at the mouth of this river compelling the tows to wait for certain stages of the tide before attempting to pass through the draw of the Long Branch Railroad Company's bridge; then they experience great difficulty in getting through.

In 1874 the General Government proposed to improve the channel by dredging the channel 400 feet wide, 13 feet deep, mean low water, extended from Shooter's Island leading past the wharves at Elizabethport with deflecting dikes on both sides of the channel. The opposition to the dikes was so influential that April 26, 1875, a general order was issued constituting a board of United States engineer officers to examine and report a plan for a channel between Staten Island and New Jersey, which board reported November 30, 1875, and in this report is the following paragraph:

"It has been urged that the projected route, by reason of the abrupt termination of direction at the eastern end of the dikes, will inconvenience the towage companies, while the advantages of a wider, deeper, and shorter channel only about a mile long between dikes more than compensate for the inconveniences of this change of direction to the larger class of vessels. It is quite probable that large tows would by preference take the present channel if suitably improved. Any proposition to dike in the present channel would doubtless prove a failure, as the meeting of Arthur Kill and Kill Von Kull currents would form a shoal somewhere between the dikes, or at the entrance, and thus defeat the purpose of their construction. This board place their decision not to recommend the dike system of improvement already commenced solely on this ground, that whatever may have been the prospective requirements of commerce on this route three years ago, its present needs do not in their opinion call for a 14-foot channel at mean low water to be attained by the construction of dikes at large cost. On the contrary they believe that the existing channel can be sufficiently improved to accommodate present commercial interests by dredging to a depth of 10 to 11 feet at mean low water by diminishing its curvature at the Corner Stakes Light, and by giving it such width as to permit the passage of large tows, and the largest class of sailing vessels in use on these waters without risk of colliding or grounding. We therefore recommend that this deepening and widening of the channel be effected in accordance with the plans which we now submit."

"As the channel in its western and difficult portion was produced by the transit of large tows drawn by steamers and the larger class of propellers, it is presumed that when deepened the same causes will help maintain that depth and diminish the expenditures that will be required from time to time for dredging."

It will be noticed that the board of engineers decided that shoals form somewhere between the dikes, or at their entrance. These dikes were to be built parallel with the channel, so that the water could flow past them. Now if shoals form around such dikes, which comparatively do not obstruct the flow of water, is it not demonstrated that if piles are driven directly across or horizontal to the flow of water of the channel or large piers built with narrow outlets that they act as a dam, stopping the flow of water in a great measure? And in consequence shoals will more readily form, and in a short time the channel will diminish down to a narrow, intricate one, caused by shoals forming around the piers of this railroad bridge, causing great inconvenience to the commercial interests of the many tributary rivers which rely on this kill as the means of a direct and economical delivery of their merchandise, and on which the General Government has expended $848,000 improving.

The maintenance of deep water and open channel at this point is a matter of more than local importance, as it not only concerns the coasting trade of New Jersey but also a considerable part of that of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, being a great outlet for easy and economical delivery to the manufactories of the New England States.

The number of vessels which pass through this channel amounts to ninety-eight thousand annually, carrying a total tonnage of 16,500,000 tons, with an estimated value of $61,592,000.

Any bridge across this kill would greatly obstruct the navigation of this channel, as the distance from Staten Island to New Jersey is only about 600 feet, and at least 300 feet of that would be occupied by the piers to support the bridge.

A bridge can be built a little farther down Staten Island Sound which would have its center pier entirely out of water, resting on Buckwheat Island, a draw on the New Jersey side of the island, and a span reaching from Buckwheat Island to Staten Island. Such a bridge should have an elevation of at least 70 feet from mean high water, and would not be an obstruction to the navigation of this highway.

For verification of commercial statistics I refer to the report of Col. G. L. Gillespie, United States Engineer Corps, United States Army, Appendix G, pages 741, 742.

A. B. BURR, C. E.,
In charge Raritan United States Government Improvement.

It will thus be seen that Major Burr contradicts flatly almost every statement made by Major Gillespie. In a matter of so much importance as this great water way, with almost double the tonnage of the Detroit River, why was not the same course pursued as was done with the proposed Detroit River bridge? Several reports favorable to the construction of the bridge had been made by Government engineers as to the propriety and feasibility of the bridge, until finally, and with commendable caution, a board of engineers was appointed, five in number, consisting of Majors Warren, Comstock, Weitzel, and Merrill, and Captain Livermore, who after carefully considering the whole matter, and although the river tonnage was only about one-half the present tonnage of the Arthur Kill, and although the river was closed to navigation four months of each year and the railway interests seemingly almost imperative, this board reversed all former decisions, declared against the bridge and in favor of a tunnel.

Now, Mr. President, I have reached that point in the discussion where I wish to refer to very many authorities upon this subject, if it is the pleasure of the Senate that I should proceed now, or I will wait until some other time, as I am very hoarse and it is almost impossible for me to speak this morning. However if the Senate would prefer that I shall conclude all I have to say on this subject, I will try and worry through it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey express any request to the Senate?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to say that the subject to which I wish to refer in my remarks hereafter will be to read from reports of different engineers, &c., touching similar improvements which have been proposed to be made in other parts of the country, and it may take me some little time. As I say, I am very hoarse, and it is almost impossible for me to speak at all.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to my colleague to let the matter go over and let the regular order be proceeded with, and he can resume his remarks to-morrow in the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from New Jersey refrains from addressing the Senate at any greater length at this time, the regular order will be presented. It is a matter for the Senator from New Jersey to determine.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire of course to consult the convenience of the Senate and the committee. It is well known that I have placed no hinderance or obstacle in the way of the discussion of this measure. I desire to have it fairly discussed before the Senate, so that the Senate may fairly understand it. If it is the desire of the Senate that I shall go on now, I will continue to do so, and conclude all I have to say about the matter.

Mr. BLAIR. I was called from the Chamber. I should like to understand the condition of the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey announced that he was nearly through with his speech when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived, and unanimous consent was given that he might conclude to-day. The Senator from New Jersey now informs the Senate that he has numerous quotations or citations to make from authorities and that he does not desire to go on further now.

Mr. BLAIR. Has it been suggested that the quotations be printed without reading them?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has heard no such suggestion.

Mr. BLAIR. If they are all citations of authorities and the Senator has suggested that he is not in a condition to speak, would it be looked upon in the light of a favorable suggestion if some one should ask, or if he should ask, that they be printed without being read? I think consent would be given.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It simply amounts to this: We have a regular order which I understood was to come up at 2 o'clock. When that hour arrived the Senator from Maine asked the courtesy of the Senate that I might conclude what I had to say on that particular part of the question of which I was then speaking. If it is the wish of the Senate that I shall continue the discussion of the bill to-day, I will continue. If it is the wish of the Senate to take up the regular order and then continue the discussion of this measure to-morrow in the morning hour, I should like to understand it.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the preference of the Senator from New Jersey? Does he prefer to go on now?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to say that having occupied the floor for an hour and a half, and being somewhat debilitated and weak, it would be very difficult for me to speak longer, and I should prefer to go on to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for, and will be proceeded with.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Pensions with instructions, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] had the floor yesterday and I think perhaps had not concluded. I understood him to say that he had not. He is not here, but is in attendance on a committee near the Senate Chamber. I desire to say a few words, and I may say them now, and give way to the Senator from Kansas if he shall desire to occupy the floor when he comes in.

Yesterday I made some allusions to the large amount of money that would undoubtedly be necessary to carry out the provisions of the bill if it should become a law. I do not desire to have it understood that in making that suggestion I was opposing the bill or finding fault with it because of that. I only wanted it to go to the country and be thoroughly understood that we can not be generous without being somewhat expensive. That is to say, if we are going to give to all these people what we claim that we should do, as a matter of generosity, as a matter of bounty, and as a matter of propriety and right, it will be a very expensive affair, and that we all understand. I did not mean to intimate that the Government of the United States was not able to meet all these demands as made upon it at any time. I do not myself think that there is any danger but what the Government will be able to do so. I do not myself think that there is any danger of the Government bankrupting itself in the payment of pensions, although as I said I would very much prefer always in voting upon a bill to know just exactly what it will cost, and that is always true of a bill which is not absolutely required as a legal obligation on the part of the Government.

I noticed that yesterday the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] in speaking of this bill, addressing himself to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], said:

He is certainly aware of the fact that the same Congress which passes this bill will be required to raise means for its fulfillment.

I understand by that that the Senator from New Jersey means to make the declaration that the present financial condition of the country will not justify the payment of the sum suggested, $25,000,000 a year; that it will become the duty of Congress to devise some method to increase the amount of money coming into the Treasury in order to meet the increased and new obligation created by the passage of the bill. If that is true, it affords a reason why we should at least go forward with some caution. I do not think it true myself. I do not think that the present financial condition of the country justifies the assertion that it will be necessary to increase our revenues for the purpose of meeting this bill if it costs even what the Senator supposes it is possible that it may cost, $50,000,000 a year. If it costs as much as that it might necessitate a suspension of some payments that the Government might pay and would otherwise make undoubtedly if the bill did not pass, but it is not possible if the bill passes that there should be any deficit, at least for some time.

In the first place, these pensions will not all of course come upon us at once. The applications will come in gradually and by degrees, and money will accumulate in the Treasury as it has been accumulating, to meet the expenditures which will be incurred under the bill.

I do not propose to go into any general financial discussion as to the methods of rasing money or as to the propriety of piling up in the Treasury Department vast sums of money. I noticed yesterday that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] said that one of the causes of strikes was the vast accumulation of money in the hands of individuals. I agree with him. The aggregation of vast fortunes in the hands of a few, whether they be corporations or individuals, has a tendency to create in this country a feeling of unrest, and it creates a feeling in the mind of a very large portion of the people that what those men have accumulated unduly they must have taken from somebody, and that it has come largely from the class of people who have the least protection at the hands of the Government, the laboring class.

So I think that the accumulation of large fortunes in the hands of a few people or corporations is an evil. I think that an equal evil is the accumulation of a very large amount of money in the Treasury of the United States. I think in fact that it is a greater evil than to have it in the hands of individuals who make use of it in some way or other. If it is in the hands of a corporation it is probably engaged in some business which makes the capital available and profitable, and everybody has some benefit from the fact that the company has the money. Locked up in the United States Treasury it is of no benefit to any person whatever.

I find by looking at the Treasury report a statement that when this administration came into power in March, 1885, the net balance in the Treasury was only eight million and some odd thousand dollars, to be accurate, $8,764,590. To force this net balance the Treasury Department was compelled to carry to the debtor side of the column $100,000,000 of gold lying in the Treasury upon the hypothesis that it might be called out of the Treasury for the purpose of the redemption of the national notes. So in fact there were $108,000,000 of surplus money in the Treasury at that time instead of a net balance of $8,000,000; but for the purpose for which I desire to call the attention of the Senate it is not necessary that that should be added.

Starting out with the assumption that $8,000,000 was the net balance, I find that when the Treasury Department made its report in November, 1885, it stated then that there had accumulated in the Treasury some $66,000,000 more than was in the Treasury in the March preceding. It is fair to presume that this money, if allowed to lie in the Treasury, was money not needed, not required for paying the obligations of the Government or for the purpose of administering the affairs of the Government.

I find by taking the last report issued by the Treasury Department in which the accounts are brought up to the date of April 30, 1886, there is a net balance in the Treasury of $106,391,874.06. When you consider for a moment the hundred million dollars that is held as a reserve for the redemption of national notes, there is in the Treasury of the United States, or was on the 1st of May, $206,391,874 more than is required for the purpose of carrying on the Government of the United States.

Mr. CAMDEN. Did the last Treasury statement include the hundred million of reserve?

Mr. TELLER. The hundred million reserve is not included in this. The hundred million is treated as a liability and is to be subtracted from this amount, because it is found in the liability account. The total amount of money in the Treasury was $505,201,319.97. Against that in the column of liabilities stands $398,809,445.91. Included in that liability will be found the hundred millions of bank reserve stated as a liability.

Of course the Government of the United States can get rid of some of this money by calling bonds, for there is a large amount of bonds which can be called. The holders of the bonds are not at all anxious that they should be called. The Government does not seem to be anxious that the bonds should be called either, because they have been called rather slowly; although I believe there has been a call since last December of $30,000,000, which has not had the effect I think of distributing very much money among the people, but on the contrary has reduced the amount of money in circulation instead of increasing it.

I cite this to show that there is no immediate danger of the bankruptcy of the Government of the United States, if we are pretty liberal in the matter of pensions; and, although I would not want to vote for any measure for the express purpose of distributing the money in the Treasury, I think it would be a good thing for the business interests of this country if $100,000,000 of that money could be distributed at once. I think a good and wise and economical administration of the affairs of the Government requires that at least from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of that money should be paid out at once.

Mr. President, not only is the $206,391,874, which is held in the Treasury serving no particular purpose, except the $100,000,000 which is supposed to be held to meet demands that may possibly, not probably, be made by the holders of greenbacks, but there is a large amount besides that could be paid out which is held to meet claims that are not expected to be presented for many years, if at all. It is undoubtedly wise for the Government to keep on hand money enough to meet all its immediate demands. Beyond that it is not at all necessary that the Government should go. Of course, it may be said that the greenbacks are a demand on the Government, and that they are a liability which must be always considered and calculated upon in determining the liabilities of the Government; and yet everybody understands that the Government is no more likely to be called upon to redeem the national greenbacks to-day than to redeem the bonds which do not mature until 1891. Nobody who was at the head of a great bank having its paper out in that way would ever think of holding one-third of its issues for the purpose of redemption if it had an income independent thereof of $1,000,000 a day; and there is not a banking institution in the United States or in the world in the same financial position that the Treasury of the United States is in that would not feel itself justified in paying out $300,000,000, discounting paper to that extent, and it would be held a solvent and sound bank in any financial circle in the world.

There need be no apprehenison or alarm that a government which can accumulate from March, 1885, to November, 1885, sixty-odd millions of money more than it needed and demanded for its current expenses and for the discharge of its obligations will not be able to meet any demand which may be made upon it by the passage of this bill.

Mr. President, I see that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is here, and I have said all I desire to say on this bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions with instructions, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] has been called away on public business. I understand that he is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. I do not know whether the Senator from Indiana has voted or not.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not notice that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] was absent. I beg to announce a pair with the Senator from Arkansas. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAWES. I am paired for the day with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHACE. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. PALMER. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who is unavoidably absent.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. If present, the Senator from Texas would vote "yea" on this proposition.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 28; as follows:

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. INGALLS. Let that be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to strike out of the amendment proposed by Mr. VAN WYCK all after the words "Provided further" and to insert:

That no pension paid under any law to any soldier hereafter shall be rated at less than $4 per month.

Mr. GEORGE. Is the amendment before the Senate now the one offered by the Senator from New Hampshire?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment now before the Senate is the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], which has just been read. It is practically to strike out "eight" and insert "four." The amendment will be again read, in order that the Senate may understand the precise question.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to inquire to what amendment that is offered as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. LOGAN. What is that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by Mr. VAN WYCK is, at the end of section 1 to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That no soldier under this act shall receive less than $8 per month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. Now the Secretary will report the amendment to it proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of Mr. BLAIR is to strike out all after the words "Provided further" and insert:

That no pension paid under any law to any soldier hereafter shall be rated at less than $4 per month.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator why not amend that so as to provide that no soldier heretofore or hereafter shall be pensioned at less than $4?

Mr. BLAIR. That is what it is; but that language would make more words. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska applies only to those who may be pensioned under this act, and if it is adopted just as offered it will give to all a pension of not less than $8. The amendment to the amendment moved by myself is that no soldier pensioned under any law, this or any former act, shall hereafter be paid a less pension than $4 per month. So if this amendment to the amendment be adopted and then the amendment be adopted as amended and become part of the bill, the law will be that no soldier pensioned shall be paid a pension of less than $4 a month.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire why when the rest of the bill applies to soldiers and sailors all through, the amendment applies only to soldiers?

Mr. BLAIR. The word "sailors" may be inserted so as to read "soldiers or sailors." I will modify my amendment so as to include "sailors."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to move an amendment. I moved an amendment the other day providing $8 per month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator that the amendment is not now in order, as it would be in the third degree. The pending question is on an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that, but I think I can offer it so that it will be in order. Day before yesterday I offered an amendment applicable to pensions under this and all other laws, providing that no pension should be rated at less than $8. It was voted down. The proposition now is to rate them at $4. I move to substitute for the amendment and the pending amendment to the amendment the words used in my former amendment, changing the amount to not less than $6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can give notice of his intention to offer such an amendment, but the amendment is not now in order. The pending question is upon the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]; a further amendment would be in the third degree and therefore out of order at this time.

Mr. LOGAN. A substitute for both, then——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would not be in order at this time.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I hope this will be voted down, and then I shall offer an amendment for $6.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to advise the Senate what persons are specified and what classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes as pensionable.

Mr. BLAIR. Has the Senator the Statutes before him?

Mr. INGALLS. I have not.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the general statute, under which soldiers, sailors, and others connected with the Army are pensioned for their participation in the war of 1861. I have the provision here in the compilation of the pension laws.

Mr. INGALLS. I have found the Revised Statutes. Section 4693 includes soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. BLAIR. And militia.

Mr. INGALLS. And militia. Now I am unable to see, that being the case, why a proviso should be attached to the bill declaring that only one of the enumerated classes shall receive a minimum pension. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if there is any reason for that or if that was the intention of the committee? Otherwise I suggest to him that the word "soldier" should be left out and the provision simply be "that no pension paid under this act shall be less than $8 a month."

Mr. BLAIR. Or "paid under any act."

Mr. INGALLS. "Under any act;" but I do not want to vote for that.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill came from the committee with none of that matter with reference to the minimum limit of pensions. One was offered by the Senator from Illinois proposing to fix the lowest pension at $8 a month. An amendment was moved to another amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] to the same effect, substituting $4 for $8. That amendment was moved by myself, and it was voted down, as was the general amendment of the Senator from Illinois making the minimum of any pension $8 payable under any act.

The effort that I am making is to fix that minimum at $4 rather than at $8, if any legislation takes place on the subject at all. The committee has recommended none whatever; and if all these amendments are negatived the bill will then stand as it came from the committee.

What the Senator from Kansas says is quite true, that if the amendment to the amendment that I offered should be adopted it would be better to substitute another which would include all the cases covered by section 4693 of the Revised Statutes. There are but very few that would be embraced more than are already embraced in the language of the amendment as it stands. These classes I can specify to the Senate:

First. Any officer of the Army, including regulars, volunteers, and militia, or any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps, or any enlisted man, &c.

That is in one section; in another:

Any master serving on a gunboat, or any pilot, engineer, sailor, or other person not regularly mustered, &c.

Third. Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, &c.

The fourth class:

Any acting assistant or contract surgeon disabled.

And the like. And—

Any provost-marshal, deputy provost-marshal, or enrolling officer disabled.

Perhaps I had better substitute for the words "soldier or sailor" the word "person."

Mr. INGALLS. The better way would be to strike out all the qualifying words after "pension" and let the proviso apply simply to pensions, declaring what shall be the lowest rate of pension under the act. If the Secretary will read the amendment, it will appear that by striking out three or four words the object the Senator desires will be attained, leaving the provision a general one, applicable to all persons entitled to pension.

Mr. BLAIR. That is what I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out of the pending amendment the words "to any soldier or sailor;" so as to read:

That no pension paid under any law hereafter shall be rated at less than $4 per month.

Mr. BLAIR. That will cover it all and will include everything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire so modifies the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest to the Senator that the amendment may be changed to some other sum. The word "persons" applies to all persons.

Mr. BLAIR. "Pension" is the word.

Mr. LOGAN. Then it would apply to all pensions, whether given to children, to soldiers, or to sailors. You have got to make a distinction and use the words "soldiers, sailors, and marines," so that it will apply to them and not interfere with the pensions of children.

Mr. BLAIR. There is a bill already pending proposing to increase the pensions of minor children to $4 per month, and hence there is no class, so far as I know, that would not be included and by proposed legislation is not already included at as high a rate as $4.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, if this amendment shall prevail the entire practice of the Pension Office will be inverted. The rule now is to take the highest rate paid as the unit and grade downward from that. Seventy-two dollars being the rate for total disability or helplessness requiring the continual attendance of another person, all other grades are established by rating downward from that to the lowest sum, which is $1 per month. If we establish a minimum rate four times the amount now paid we dislocate the entire system, and it will require a rerating of all pensions upon an entirely novel basis. I assume that the Senator from New Hampshire does not want to do that.

Mr. BLAIR. I would suggest to the Senator that the amendment to which he is really speaking is that of the Senator from Nebraska, which proposes to fix the minimum at $8, and I moved to modify that by fixing it at $4. I do not say that I care whether either amendment is adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. The principle is the same whether $4 or $8 is fixed as the minimum.

Mr. BLAIR. There are twenty-five or thirty thousand small cases less than $4, and it seems to be rather trifling with a man to give him such an infinitesimal sum.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the man who trifles is the man who applies for a pension under these circumstances, a man who is not disabled at all practically but merely technically, who has had some little trifling mutilation, or some scar, or some sort of bodily hurt that does not at all interfere with his capacity to earn his livelihood or transact his business insomuch that when you come to what his condition is physically by medical examination, taking the highest rate of total disability as the unit, it is determined that he is entitled to $1 a month as a pension. The trifling is with the man who applies for it, and not with the system that gives it to him. And instead of saying that the man who now gets a dollar a month after having been examined by a board of surgeons sworn to discharge their duty shall have $4 a month, the wiser and better and more patriotic course would be to say that no man who can establish a claim to no higher disability than that shall receive any pension at all.

There is not any reason or justice in saying that those men who have technically established a claim to a pension that does not disable them or impair their capacity for earning a livelihood shall be increased either to $4 or to $8 per month. It is an injustice to those men who have been disabled. I do not regard it at all as trifling on the part of those who have the control of this business when they decide, after an examination of all the facts in the case, that a man is entitled to but $1 a month.

Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from New Hampshire declares that both these amendments are excrescences on this bill; that they are interpolations not considered by the committee, not desired by the committee, but put on here for some reason after the bill reaches the Senate—I will not say with what object or purpose or with what design or with what intent, but placed here illogically and without any concurrence on the part of the committee—I hope neither of them will be agreed to, and that we shall be enabled to come down to the simple proposition involved in this bill, and that is, whether or not the man who has served in the Army of the United States and not been disabled, but is subsequently incapacitated by disease from obtaining a livelihood for himself, shall be placed on the pension-roll, rather than become an object of public charity, without being compelled to prove that his disability resulted from his military service. I therefore move to lay this amendment on the table.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust the Senator will not press that motion.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw the motion if the Senator desires to speak.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir; only for a moment. I did not intend to say anything more on this amendment or the features connected with it or what might follow as a necessary consequence from it, beyond, before the question is put on the amendment to the amendment, explaining more fully the state of the case.

The Senator from Kansas says that this amendment comes here without action of the committee and that it is an excrescence upon this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I took what the Senator from New Hampshire said.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not say it was an excrescence.

Mr. INGALLS. That was an inference.

Mr. BLAIR. Then you could not have taken it from what I said.

Mr. INGALLS. The remark I made was based on what you said.

Mr. BLAIR. I said it had not been considered or recommended by the committee, which is true; but the committee would hardly be justified in taking the ground that an amendment offered in the Senate was necessarily an excrescence upon their work. It is very liable to be a great improvement upon it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I took occasion at one time in the discussion to state that this matter of the amount of pensions was not, as I understood it, adjudicated upon by the committee. There are two propositions as to the amount, and in order to make myself clear I will repeat what I said before. I introduced three amendments to this bill for the purpose of establishing the point sought to be arrived at by me, and all three would bear interpretation on the theory which we supposed properly attached to this bill.

The case referred to by the Senator from Kansas yesterday very properly was that of an injury to a man who had labored at the profession of the law, or medicine if you please, or as an editor, by his losing his fingers in the service. If a man loses any portion of his limbs or is disabled, it makes no difference whether he may have been ten days in the service or served four years, it is an actual injury for which the existing law says he shall have a pension.

Mr. INGALLS. Specifically.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Specifically; no matter whether he is rich or poor, no matter whether he served ten days or four years, he gets no more and no less for that injury. But now we propose to establish another class of pensioners, which are service pensions subject to conditions. This service pension requires six months' service. If a man has served five months and twenty-nine days, no matter what the extent of his disability, under this bill he does not get a pension. He must have served six months; and then there are two other conditions, that he shall be dependent and that he shall be disabled. My idea always has been in a bill of this kind that a man's disability should amount to an inability to procure his livelihood by his labor, and I suppose that a soldier who did not come within that condition first of six months' service and then disability to earn a livelihood should not be placed on the pension-roll. That has always been my notion of a pension of this kind.

We start with the theory of benefiting those who actually need it on account of their necessity, because they are unable to procure their daily bread by daily labor. Any disability less than that should not place a person on the pension-roll. Any disability greater than that, because it could be no greater, should entitle him to no greater pension. It must be incapacity, no matter what the cause, to procure his daily bread by his daily labor; and when you find a case of that kind it is total incapacity. Anything less than that, in my judgment, should never be placed on the pension-roll.

That is the point from which we start on this matter. The main question is, shall it be a uniform pension? So I always supposed; I supposed every service pension should be a uniform pension. I supposed it was to be $10. If the disability is not entitled to that, it is entitled to nothing. No matter whether it proceeds from prostration or asthma or consumptiou, or whether it be both legs off or both arms off, it is incapacity to work. Hence it was that in this class of pensions I suggested that the rate of disability should be to incapacitate for obtaining a livelihood by labor, and by that was meant a complete livelihood. If a man was able to go around and do chores for a few days in the week he was incapacitated to earn his complete livelihood, and therefore was completely incapacitated. I thought that proposition would extend the bounty of this bill to a class of men that the people of the nation were desiring should be benefited, and would reach the greater number of cases. Therefore it was that I desired first to settle the class of cases and then the amount of pension to be allowed; and I thought I had made myself clear on that matter.

With this one amendment standing alone saying the pension shall be $8 a month, and with the other parts of the bill remaining that the pension may be graded down, I concede there would be an inconsistency. It would be an injustice to those already on the pension-roll who may be receiving two or three dollars for a disability that under this bill you give $8 for. But that is the point to be considered and the only point that I desired by the three or four amendments I submitted to bring to the consideration of the Senate, whether we should fix this rate at $24 running down to $1, or whether it should be a uniform rate of $8 a month.

The only purpose and the only idea, as I understand, of the American people, which finds its echo here, should be and is to prevent the spectacle, revolting to the American people, that there should be a portion of their soldiers, from a disability incurred after the service, dying in the poor-house or begging on the street-corners. That was the purpose of the bill, and I did not suppose it was to be extended further than that.

If a strong, able-bodied man, competent to earn his livelihood, lost one finger, or two or three fingers, a disability known and recognized under the law, and which yet might not affect his power to earn his bread by his own labor, he should not go on the pension-roll. As I understand, this bill provides that this class of cases shall go on the pension-roll; and therefore the proposition I make is not an excrescence, but one of the features of the bill. After we have determined the class, then comes the question of the amount of pension. Therefore I supposed it was perfectly logical, for until the bill appeared here I did not know that the bill was coming from this committee. So I had to add that feature to it. It is true, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, it was in the bill of the Forty-eighth Congress.

I desire to say nothing further than to explain, which I have sought in these few words to do, precisely the point whether we shall fix this pension at $24, running down to any sum, even as low as $1 or $2 per month. If that is its judgment, let the Senate say so. If it desires the other proposition, let that be said. But I did not suppose when it was proposed, nor do I think the Grand Army of the Republic ever formulated, a bill arranged in this way. They did ask that Congress should recognize the claim of disability and dependence on the part of the old soldier, even where that disability occurred after the close of the war; but I think they never formulated the amount of the payment and how it should be graduated.

I shall be content with what the action of the Senate may be. My only object has been to extend its provisions so as to reach the greatest number of deserving and desirable cases. I dread to submit the claims of soldiers for disabilities incurred in the service or afterwards to any Pension Department, no matter under what administration, for unfortunately it is the case that generally their sympathies somehow or other seem to be against the claim of the soldier, and if there be a doubt in the evidence it is generally resolved against the soldier; and if there is any doubt as to the amount of the money which should be allowed because of the disability, the general tendency seems to be to fix it at the lowest amount. Therefore I think justice would be nearer done to the people and to the claimants of this bounty by fixing in the law a uniform amount to be paid to each pensioner.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have only a word or two to say in opposition to the principles of this bill, while I will vote for the amendment reducing the minimum pension rate from $8 to $4 per month.

Heretofore all pensions have been limited to those persons who have been injured in the service of the United States or whose present ailment can be traced distinctly to disease originating in the service. This bill proposes to pension all men who were in the military or naval service for a period of six months and have been honorably discharged therefrom who now depend upon their own exertion for support, if they should happen to be injured at any time either this year or hereafter. That is a very wide departure from any class of injuries or ailments that has been considered pensionable heretofore. In other words, this bill proposes to pension men who may never have heard a gun fired, who may never have been exposed to danger or risk in any form in the military or naval service. He may have been stationed in New York or Boston in some quartermaster or commissary establishment in the service of the United States, and may have been discharged honorably after six months' service after receiving full pay for his work without ever having been within 100 miles of an enemy. He may be, as was suggested yesterday, a lawyer in full practice, earning annually $5,000, or, to use my illustration of yesterday, a stenographer at our desk making three or four thousand dollars a year; and yet, if in opening his door or riding in his buggy he loses a little finger by accident (which would have made him pensionable if it had been lost by a gunshot wound or any other accident while he was in the military or naval service) he is to be pensioned because that is a physical disability and he is making his living by his labor, whether at the bar, in the pulpit, or anywhere else, no matter how small the disability is if it is a disability that would have entitled him to a pension if it had been received in the service of the United States.

If for example by a gunshot wound from the enemy he had lost his little finger he would be pensionable, and if by mashing it in the door of his house he loses it to-morrow, more than twenty years after he left the service, having been a healthy and unhurt man, having never heard a gun fired, having occupied a safe position during the six months he served, he is to be pensioned at not less than $8 a month, and his wife and children are also to be pensioned after he is dead.

I have heard of men cutting off their fingers during the late war to avoid the draft. There may be men in this country who would be glad to lose a little finger to secure a pension of $8 a month for themselves and their wives and their minor children.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator does not understand that the bill provides any fixed pension at $8 a month or more.

Mr. BECK. I understand that is the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. BLAIR. But it is not in the bill.

Mr. BECK. It is the proposition we are now required to vote on. The loss of a finger now by a man twenty-five years after his discharge from the service will entitle him to a pension, and the minimum shall be $8 a month if the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska prevails and $4 if it does not.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I suggested that the pensions be uniform at $8, and that no person shall be entitled to a pension unless his disability is to the extent of incapacity to obtain his livelihood by his labor.

Mr. BECK. That is not the provision of the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I tried to explain that that was not the provision of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator describes a disability now which under existing law is pensionable at $72. So this bill, if it should pass and pass in the way the Senator from Nebraska explains that he wants to have it passed, would cover the cases of two hundred and forty or two hundred and fifty thousand now on the roll. It would cover nine hundred and thirty cases, if that number can be found, who have that disability not contracted in the service, but who had rendered service to the country, so that it would be no bill at all to reach the poor.

Mr. BECK. The $4 a month proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is less objectionable than the $8, and therefore I shall vote with him that far. That was really about all I rose to say.

But I think the principle of the bill, extending beyond disabilities incurred in the service and carrying the pension-roll to a point that there is no warrant for in either reason, or justice is objectionable.

Up to this time no one who was in the service ever expected that it would be carried to the length now proposed. The pension-roll is now a very heavy one. I know complaint is made against all of us who desire reasonable economy. It is said that we are grumbling about the amount of money that is being expended for pensions, yet in spite of all these flings, when we consider that $765,000,000 have been paid for pensions up to the 1st day of last July, and that all the expenses of this Government from the day of General Washington's inauguration until after the inauguration of Mr. Polk, for fifty-five years, for all the expenses of the Government, including the Army, the Navy, and everything else, were less than $765,000,000, we can form some idea of the magnitude of the sum that has been paid for pensions. And when we come to consider still further that it is proposed to pension men who have been healthy for years and years after the termination of the war, many of whom have rendered no service except being subject to call for six months, and that our present taxation has to be made that much more onerous, while it is so adjusted now that all the money comes out of the labor of the very poorest of our people who are struggling to make a bare living for themselves and their families, the impropriety of such legislation will be manifest.

If this bill passes I hope that a provision will be made requiring the wealth of the country to support the people who have become poor because of their service to the country in time of war. I think every well-regulated government ought to have an income tax at least upon incomes over $5,000 a year, and I hope to see attached to this bill in the other House, if it can not be done here, a provision that there shall be a graduated tax upon the incomes of the men of wealth of this country corresponding with the pension-list, so that the wealth of the country shall pay for the services of the soldiers who have lost their health in protecting the property which is not now taxed, or at least very inadequately taxed.

If that were done more care perhaps would be exhibited by very many people who are now clamorous for the granting of pensions than is now shown when they are to be paid out of the now grievous taxation on the poor and all their wants and needs. There is no reason why it should not be done. There is no more legitimate tax than a tax upon the incomes of the men who have made their money by the methods described by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] yesterday, through the watered stock of railroads, protective tariff, class legislation, and the ten thousand other devices that have made so many millionaires, who manage to avoid taxation altogether, and can therefore very well afford to pay a tax on their incomes to pay pensions, instead of raising these vast sums as now by taxation on the necessaries of life of the poorest of our people in order to increase the wealth of the monopolists by increased taxation. But I am not going into that question at this time. I only take occasion to express the hope and wish which I have stated. I shall vote for the amendment to the amendment, but I am not content with the principle of the bill extending bounties and donations when no injuries were received in the service and no disease traceable to the service is even suggested. I shall oppose all such measures, believing them to be only devices to maintain unjust and oppressive taxation on the industries and labor of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, can I offer my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now in order.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, sir. I offer, then, as an amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That any pension hereafter allowed or paid to any soldier, sailor, or marine under this or any other act shall not be less than $6 per month.

Mr. President, just one word in response to what the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has said. Of course he did not intend an unfair argument, and I hope he will not consider that I am criticising what he has said when I remark that I do not think the argument he made and which has so often been made by opponents of pension bills is a fair one. Because a soldier has lost his little finger and gets a pension for that, to say that this bill is made for the purpose of pensioning that class of persons is not a fair argument. Why? It is only occasionally that you find a person who is disabled in that way. That is an exception to the rule. The majority of those who are disabled by disease, whether contracted in the service or since the expiration of their term of service, are not of that class. There might be found a few of that class in the country; but there are very few on the pension-rolls of that class. It is very seldom that any one is pensioned for the loss of a little finger or something of that kind. The majority of those pensioned are persons who are disabled by disease, and more that are disabled by disease will be pensioned under this bill than of those disabled by wounds. They contracted the disease probably in the service, but they are not capable of proving it, and why?

Every one who is familiar with the facts connected with the granting of pensions knows that the soldier who was disabled early in the war or during the war from disease and who went to the hospitals is readily pensioned, because such persons have no trouble in proving their cases. It is the man who did his duty faithfully, and who when he was stricken down by disease that was not considered dangerous remained in camp and did not go to hospital, who fails to get his pension. That class of persons have very hard work to prove their cases. Their associates who were living with them in tent during the time, their messmates, as they were called, have changed their residences and are located in different parts of the country, and the applicant for a pension who is not able to find them fails in his testimony, and he fails in obtaining his pension, although he deserves it as much as a man who was in hospital and who can prove by the hospital records that he was sick. This is and has been one of the great troubles in connection with very many who are really entitled to pensions. They are not able to prove the fact of the contraction of the disease in the service. This bill applies to that class of cases.

There is another class of cases to which it applies, as the Senator from Kentucky said—persons who have received injuries since the war; but when he says that a person who is making his $5,000 a year is included in this bill I disagree with him. That is not the case. It is where a person earns his livelihood by his labor and is disabled from doing it that he is to be pensioned, not a person who can make $5,000 a year or $10,000 or even $500 a year, if that is a competency for him, but it is those who are so disabled by disease or injury that they are not capable of making for themselves a living. It is that class to which this bill applies.

As I have before stated, I at one time saw a soldier who had served through the entire war, a stout, healthy man, and on a Fourth of July he was firing a gun and lost both arms in firing that gun. He is not competent to make a living of any kind. Both arms are off, one above the elbow and one just below. I saw the poor unfortunate man and gave him all the assistance I could. That man ought to have a pension; he ought to have a pension because he was a soldier who served his country, and because by misfortune he has been deprived of the power of making for himself a living. I think so at least.

Now, so far as the amount of pay is concerned, as I said before—and I do not desire to repeat at any length—I do not believe that $1, or $2, or $3, or $4 is a sufficient pension for a man who is entitled to draw a pension at all. I tried to have this pension raised to $8, but I was voted down. Of course I shall not bother the Senate by trying it again, but the amendment I have now proposed is $6 a month.

The Senator who is in charge of the bill well knows the fact that the soldiers of this country know more about the troubles, trials, and diseases of one another than any other class of people. They are associated together in their little societies and organizations and they learn the ills of one another. They have almost universally throughout this country petitioned Congress to do away with these small pensions for the very reason I mentioned the other day, that no physician can tell the sufferings of these men who have a disease that is not prominent and apparent to all, and you have to take the man's word for it as to his suffering. No evidence can be produced to prove the amount of suffering. Therefore you must take the man's word. The Department can only have his word. His evidence is not considered sufficient. Then they rate him. If he walks about and labors somewhat, performs some labor, they give him $1, or $2, or $3 a month.

In my judgment—and I do not ask any man to be governed by my opinion—it is absurd for the Government to pay a pension of that character, if it pays any at all. I would, as the Senator from Kansas said, rather not have a pension, if I was a pensioner, than to be put off with a dollar a month and have to make out my certificate four times a year for a dollar a month or have somebody else to do it if I was not competent to do it. I think it is absurd and preposterous to give a pension of that kind.

As pensions have been given heretofore, there has, as I said the other day, been a discrimination made against the Union soldier. He has not received the character of bounty that other soldiers have who have served this country. I said he had not received land as all other soldiers had. He has not received the rating of pension that all other soldiers had. He is reduced down from $8 to $1 in many instances, and the others were not. My object was to put them upon the same plane of equality where all other soldiers have been heretofore placed.

I think $6 is too small an amount, but as $8 was not accepted by the Senate I hope, if they will accept any change whatever, they will adopt at least the proposition of $6 per month, for if there is any man in this country who served it for three years or four years or nearly five years at $13 per month when money in which he was paid was worth only from 37 to 40 cents on the dollar, and has expended all of it and much more for his family, if he had one, or in supplying himself at times in getting provisions that the Government did not furnish—if such a man is disabled at all, if this Government can not afford to pay him $72 a year for the remainder of his life if he is disabled so that he can not make a living, no matter when that misfortune occurred, then I do not think that this Government performs its duty toward that unfortunate man.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Illinois that the Chair was not aware of the fact when he ruled that the Senator's amendment was in order a few moments since that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire was itself a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. Hence, to entertain the amendment of the Senator from Illinois at this time would be to propose to strike out what the Senate has by vote just inserted in the amendment; and the opinion of the Chair is upon that state of facts that while the bill remains in committee the Senator's amendment will not be in order if he intends it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as amended.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from New Hampshire offered his as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment in the nature of a substitute, as the Chair is informed by the Secretary.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not so understand. I offered a substitute and the Chair said it was out of order.

Mr. INGALLS. It was a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. BLAIR. It was to strike out all after the words "provided further," and to insert.

Mr. LOGAN. It was an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair is now advised by the Secretary, however, the effect of the Senator's amendment is to strike out precisely what has just been inserted, and to insert other language in lieu. That being so, it would not be in order while the bill is in committee; it will be in order in the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Can not the Senator from Illinois move to strike out the word "four" in the amendment and insert "six?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In view of the fact that the Senate has by vote within the last few minutes inserted the word "four," the Chair thinks it would not be in order to move to strike that out while the bill remains in Committee of the Whole. It will certainly be in order to do so when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I, of course, submit to the opinion of the Chair, but at the same time it certainly is an opinion that has not been followed in this Senate very generally. Only day before yesterday the very same proposition was entertained by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the proposition was to strike out anything other or in addition to the language which has just been inserted the Chair would unhesitatingly hold that the amendment of the Senator was in order; but the proposition, as the Chair now understands it, is to strike out no more nor less, but precisely what the Senate has just inserted, and that being true, the Chair holds that it would not be in order to move to strike that out and insert something else.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Nebraska offered an amendment proposing to establish the minimum rate of pension at $8 in certain language. The Senator from New Hampshire moved to amend the amendment, or to strike out of it all after the words "Provided further," and insert certain language limiting the minimum of pensions to $4 per month. Then when that amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire was agreed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska had been amended, and the question then was, will the Senate agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska as amended upon the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire. Therefore it appears to me that this is still in an amendable stage. While I differ with great diffidence from authority so eminent and so long unquestioned as that of the occupant of the chair, I should still venture to say that inasmuch as the question has not yet been put on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as amended, while that is pending the Senator from Illinois would plainly have the right, the parliamentary question being undetermined before the Senate, to ask the opinion of the Senate as in Committee of the Whole whether that should be finally amended by inserting the word "six" instead of "four."

I am opposed to all these propositions, the eight, the six, and the four; but speaking from a parliamentary standpoint, it seems to me, with very great deference to the Chair, that the ruling would result in great inconvenience, and that the question is still undetermined whether the Senate will agree to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will not interpose the question of order. The Senator has suggested it or made the question of order, and if there be no objection the Chair will entertain the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BLAIR. I was about to ask that by unanimous consent the amendment be entertained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendment is not technically strictly in order at this time. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as amended.

Mr. LOGAN. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I am opposed to all these alterations of the pension law. I do not believe it is wise policy to adopt the provision proposed by the Senator from Nebraska or any of these others. The only effect is to take more money out of the Treasury, and I shall vote against all these propositions. But I want to say that in my opinion the pension laws of this country have been as liberal as those of any country on earth, and that we have to-day as large a pension-roll as ever was provided for by any country of which I know. We have paid out since the close of the war a larger amount of money in pensions I suppose than ever was paid in the same length of time by any other country on earth. Yet the proposition of this bill and all the amendments offered to it is looking to further increase the expenditures from the public Treasury for the purpose of pensions.

I appreciate as highly as any person does the service rendered by the soldiers of the country, and I have never knowingly voted against any person having a pension who I believed was entitled to it under the laws of the land. I voted against the arrears-of-pensions act because I believed that that was a mere gratuity, just as this is a bounty, as was said yesterday by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. To bounties that are unnecessary, whether in the form of subsidies or in the form of additional amounts to soldiers, I am opposed. Unless there is an absolute necessity for the expenditure of public money I believe we ought not to expend it.

The time was when in this Senate Chamber the efforts of Senators was to scrutinize expenditures and to guard the public interests against wastefulness and extravagance; but the tendency to-day is in exactly the opposite direction, and our whole legislation is looking to see how we can expend the public money.

I shall not inquire into the motives of the extravagant disposition on the part of Congress, either of this House or the other, but I venture the remark that with reference to pensions to soldiers the only way to stop that would be by a constitutional amendment to deprive all soldiers of a right to vote, of which I would not be in favor, or to provide by a constitutional amendment that no man who has served in Congress should ever be eligible to the position of an incumbent of the White House.

We are all human and governed sometimes by our ambition. If the soldiers of this country had no votes to-day you would hear nothing about the patriotism which prompted the expenditure of the public money for the purpose of pensioning soldiers. It is because the soldiers have a vote that their voice is potential in this Hall. We had as well speak the truth about this matter.

There are other people just as worthy as the soldiers. There are ladies in this land who are earning their living by their needle. We do not hear any talk of pensioning them or providing for their necessities. Many of the soldiers are needy, but the country has provided liberally for them if their inability resulted from service for the country.

If there is any man who has not been provided for, whose disabilities were incurred in the war, let him be provided for; but this bill provides for a service pension. Many of the soldiers are worthy men, and the country ought to deal liberally with them, but there are other people just as worthy.

We are looking at what we can do with the money in the Treasury. I heard a speech yesterday from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], in which he talked about the beneficial effects of the distribution of money. I heard a speech this morning on the other side of the Chamber by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], in which he talked about wanting a hundred millions distributed out of the public Treasury. I have not heard a single member of the Senate talk about the source from whence this money comes. Where does it come from, sir? It comes out of taxes upon the poor people of this country as well as the rich.

Look at the taxes the people of this country are paying! Look, for instance, at the clothing of the people of this country! What does it cost to clothe the American people? I venture the assertion at once that it will take a billion dollars to furnish the clothing that is worn by the people of this country. It is true that all that clothing is not imported, and therefore does not pay duty, but that which is manufactured in this country is protected by the duty upon that which is imported, and the price of it is enhanced by reason of the duties put upon that which is imported; so upon the billion dollars paid out annually for clothing in this country at the rate of 40 per cent. that would amount to $400,000,000, which is paid alone upon the clothing of the country. Then there are many other articles, articles of diet and of food, which are subject to taxation, and almost every article of furniture. When you come to the enormous amount of taxes paid directly or indirectly by the people of this country it amounts to $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 annually, and yet you are talking about increasing the expenditures of the Government, and therefore increasing necessarily the expenses of Government to the people of the country. We ought to look rather to a reduction of the expenditures than to an extravagant expenditure of money. We ought to look to see whether we can not reduce the burdens of the people.

While there may be three or four hundred thousand soldiers who are needy, there are five millions of people equally as needy as they are to-day, who are helping to pay the taxes which you are giving away to the soldiers and to others. Go through the rural sections of the country. There are men and women toiling from early dawn until late at night, scarcely able to make a living. They have to pay taxes upon their clothing, upon much that they eat, upon all that they have in their houses in the shape of furniture, and yet we never turn to look to that class of people; it is to some person who has a vote that we can secure by appropriations of the public money.

For one, while I remain in the Senate I shall not vote subsidies nor bounties which are not demanded by the public service to any class of men, and if the consequence to me is that I am retired from public life well and good, I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that while serving in the Senate I have followed the dictates of my own judgment in that regard and that I have not been influenced by a desire to promote my political interests.

Mr. President, I would do anything that is proper and right to be done by the soldiers. As the bill is now amended we are to increase the pension of a man who has $1 to $4. The proposition of the Senator from Illinois is to increase it to $6. Those men were rated under the law at the time when their disabilities occurred or soon after. Many are to-day on the pension-rolls who ought not to be there because the disability has passed away; and I expect, while I do not know the fact, that if there was a perfect scrutiny into the present condition of pension affairs there would be found a very considerable percentage of those now on the roll and drawing pensions from the Government whose disabilities have disappeared and who are as able to make their living as any other person of the same age in the country.

I shall not vote for any of these propositions. I might vote for a proposition to reduce the amount proposed in the bill, as I would have voted for a proposition to reduce the limit from $8 to $4 for the purpose of limiting it as far as possible, but against the bill, however amended, I shall cast my vote.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I certainly did not intend to occupy the time of the Senate any further, but I can not sit quietly by and listen to so remarkable a speech as I have just heard from the Senator from Delaware without responding very briefly to some of the points which he suggests.

The question as to whether a person shall receive a pension who has not been in the Army, because he is poor, is one which I have never heard mooted before. I have never known that line to be drawn at all, and the suggestion made that the fact of a person being in impoverished circumstances shall be the only merit which shall cause the Government to give him a pension

As I understand the Senator, he does not believe that patriotism is worthy of his country. He does not believe that because a man served his country faithfully he is entitled to any more than one who failed to serve it faithfully. He does not believe that a government should hold out inducements to a man to defend its flag and its honor. He does not believe that a man is gifted with any patriotism in his breast, but he is a mere machine to be employed for pecuniary gain

The Senator even insinuates that if it were not that soldiers had votes to give at the polls there would be no pensions granted them. I am willing that the Senator shall apply that remark to himself. If he holds within his breast a heart so bloodless as that, without sympathy toward these unfortunates, I am perfectly willing that he shall enjoy all the consolation it gives him.

But, sir, so far as I am concerned I do not appeal for pensions for votes. I have never appealed for votes on any ground. I appeal for pensions on the ground of misfortune, on the ground of sympathy, on the ground of charity, on the ground of a duty that the Government owes to its preservers and protectors, and upon no other ground; and he who insinuates that men who have sympathy with the unfortunate soldier are only actuated by sinister motives or designs to procure their votes has a poorer opinion of honesty and honor than I desire to have of him.

Sir, it is the most remarkable statement that I ever listened to, and it would have only been stronger if the ability had been greater. When the time comes in this land that men stand up in the Senate Chamber and from the standpoint of opposition to the honor of this Government declaim against the right of the Government to grant charities or bounties to the unfortunate men who have become so in defense of the Government which protects them to-day, I say then the respect of the soldier for that class of men ought to cease. How can the soldiers have respect for men who declare that they are entitled to nothing on account of having served their country?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator intends to insinuate that I made any such allusion to the soldiers it is not justified by what I said. I said the country had provided liberally for the soldiers, and that if there was any disabled soldier in the land who had not been provided for he ought to be provided for.

The Senator certainly could not have listened to my remarks on that point, for I want to say that I made no personal application of my general remarks to anybody. If the Senator sees proper to give it a personal application I can not help that. I did not give it any personal application. I only made a general statement and a statement which I think the people of this country believe to-day, that our action here in reference to pensions is being influenced to a certain extent at least by the very fact that soldiers have votes. I think the country believes it. I made no personal application to the Senator from Illinois, but if he sees proper to give it a personal application to himself I can not avoid it.

Mr. LOGAN. The latter speech of the Senator is amusing. I did not take what he said as personal to myself; I took it as personal to every one who was in favor of granting these benefits to soldiers. I am not the only advocate of those unfortunate men; I do not take it to myself; but I was only trying to give the Senator to understand what he had said so that he might apply that to himself.

What I said was that the distinction was not drawn by his remarks between those who served their country and those who did not; that his argument was on the basis that one person was entitled to a pension just as much as another if he was unfortunate and poor. That was his argument, and that was what I was replying to. It was that patriotism had nothing to do with a pension; that service had nothing to do with it, and the only question was the want of the individual.

I was replying to that, and further I was replying to the remark which he made that because they had votes was the only reason why they were pensioned. In governments where they do not vote they are pensioned. Under the lead of the autocrats of countries where men have not been entitled to vote they have always had pensions. There is not a government on earth, whether the soldier votes or does not vote, that does not pension the unfortunate soldier, and his widow and orphans also.

I presume there are not very many soldiers perhaps in Delaware who have votes, because there are but few people who vote there, for some reason or other, I do not know what. In my State all men twenty-one years old who have not disfranchised themselves are entitled to vote, whether they have been soldiers or not. There are more people there who have not been soldiers than there are who have been soldiers; so that if the theory of the Senator is right, that the people believe what he says they believe, the soldiers' vote would amount to very little in this country when compared to the vote of those who were not soldiers. So the argument is very light so far as that particular is concerned, as well as in other particulars.

I presume that the women who are widows of soldiers and the children who are the orphans of unfortunate soldiers have no vote in Delaware. They have not in my State. Why should I or any other Senator be in favor of pensioning a widow? Forsooth, because she votes, would be the argument of the Senator from Delaware. Why should I be in favor of pensioning a child one year old? Because it votes, says the Senator from Delaware. Did a man ever hear such an argument fall from the lips of a great statesman before? I never did. It is new; it is novel. It is an argument which ought to be preserved and handed down to be declaimed by boys in schools, that they might learn the patriotic devotion of men in this country who believe that nothing but a desire for votes can cause a Senator to vote for a pension.

What causes Senators here to vote for clearing out spring branches, as has been done? Money is appropriated for rivers and places where boats never could float. Is that for the benefit of the country, or to accommodate some particular section of the country? I do not hear the Senator declaim against that. The only loud declamation that I hear from him at different times is against pension bills for unfortunate soldiers because the Treasury is being robbed!

When the Senator speaks of men who agree on this subject taking money out of the Treasury to pay the soldier, it is not robbery. The only time the Treasury has ever been robbed in this Government was when those left it whom the soldiers brought back; and it comes in very bad grace from any Senator to talk about robbing the Treasury by paying pensions to unfortunate soldiers. I do not allude to this for the purpose of harrowing up and arousing the feelings of any one; but I do say that when men insinuate that others are willing to rob the Treasury to pay these soldiers they had better turn their attention back a few years and see when the Treasury was robbed and by whom it was done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not intend that the Senator from Illinois shall put me in a false position. I said nothing against pensioning soldiers who had been wounded in the service. This bill is not for that purpose. It is a service-pension bill for disabilities incurred at any time since the service was rendered, and it is that bill to which I am opposed.

I said expressly in the remarks which I made that the country had provided for the soldiers who were disabled during the war, and that if there was any soldier thus disabled who had not been provided for it should be done. I spoke against extending the bounty of the Government to men who were not wounded or who did not receive any disability in the war, men who have become diseased, as everybody is liable to become diseased, since the termination of the war, not traceable to the war, but traceable to the afflictions which fall upon humanity.

I do not intend that the Senator from Illinois shall hold me up as being opposed to the pensioning of soldiers under the laws who had received wounds in the war or who became diseased while in the service of their country. It is against extending that, and giving now what I consider a bounty to men who were not wounded in the war, who contracted no disease in the war, simply from the fact that they were once in the war—it is against the provisions of such a bill that I spoke.

The Senator seems to talk with some feeling. He was a gallant soldier in the war and he deserves well of his country, but at the same time he is not to be allowed to dictate to everybody else what their views shall be. If Senators on this side of the Chamber see proper to differ with him it comes very ungraciously from him to say that they were unpatriotic and that they have got no patriotism. The simple fact that a man wore epaulets is not a proof of his patriotism more than the man who in any other of the walks of life faithfully discharged his duty to his country.

I defy the Senator to point to any word of mine or to any act of mine that was not in perfect consonance and harmony with the interest of the Government of the country at the time of the war. I voted the Democratic ticket. If that was evidence of disloyalty, I plead guilty to it.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say anything about disloyalty.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No duty that I owed to this Government was ever omitted, and I have no doubt that I went as far as the Senator to discharge my duty. I do not mean to say that I rendered as much service, for he was a gallant officer in the war, but I went as far from compromising myself with those with whom my country was engaged in war as he would have gone. I remember at one time while passing through Canada being invited to see certain gentlemen who were there as representatives of the confederate government. I positively declined to see them, on the ground that I had no right to hold intercourse with those who were fighting against the country to which I belonged.

I declined to see Mr. Thompson, Mr. Clay, and other gentlemen to whom I could have been introduced, on the ground that I had no right as a citizen of the United States to hold any intercourse whatever with the enemies of my country. The imputation in the remarks of the Senator that gentlemen who differ with him are not actuated by as loyal motives as himself is unjust at least.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I made no such imputation. I was discussing the remarks of Senators, and said that they made that argument; and so they did.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; the Senator was not discussing the position of the Senator from Delaware at all. He was misrepresenting the position, doubtless unintentionally.

Mr. LOGAN. If I misrepresented the Senator I beg his pardon. I did not intend to do so, and I do not think I did.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say it was doubtless unintentional, but he was misrepresenting my position.

Mr. LOGAN. One position the Senator occupied I did not allude to for the reason that I did not know it. If I had known that he was in Canada at that time I should have alluded to that fact.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Illinois represented the Senator from Delaware as being opposed to all pensions. That is not true in fact, and no word that has escaped me has justified such a remark from the Senator from Illinois.

I have observed in the discussion which has been going on upon this bill that gentlemen who see proper to take their view of the subject are disposed to attribute a want of patriotism to others who do not coincide with them. I have my views, and I am not afraid to express them in the Senate or out of it; and I am willing to be judged by them; but I am not willing to be judged by the interpretation of the Senator from Illinois. When I want an interpreter of what my meaning or my position is I shall not seek for it in that quarter.

I only intended to express my opinion because the yeas and nays were called upon the pending amendment, and to say that I intend to vote against the bill and against every proposition which proposes to increase the pensions of this country for the purposes named in the bill.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, I was a Union man during the war, and at the close of it I was one of the very few Democrats who was left upon the registration roll of my State and allowed to vote because of the test-oath then required there. There is not a man who has a more generous sympathy for the disabled soldiers of the Union than I have. I should be willing to vote generous pensions to every soldier who was wounded or disabled in the war or whose disabilities resulted from his service in the Army.

But I think that our bounty should cease at that point. I am not in favor of voting either service pensions or other pensions to those who came out of the war uninjured and possessing all the vigor of constitution with which they entered the Army. The men who served in the war of the rebellion are mainly still young men or men in the prime of life.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CAMDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the Senator to say that he is opposed to service pensions. Did he not vote for the Mexican pension bill last year, which was a service pension, and nothing else?

Mr. CAMDEN. I think I voted against it. I know that I was opposed to it.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very sorry to hear that you did oppose it.

Mr. CAMDEN. I voted in committee against it, and I do not hesitate to say here now that I voted against it in the Senate in the form that it finally assumed. I was opposed then, and I am opposed to-day, to service pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war for the very reason that if we extend service pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war at this time, it will be but a very short period until, upon the same principle, service pensions will be granted to the soldiers of the late war. Although the lapse of time will not be so great, it will be the precedent which will establish a service pension to every soldier of this country before three years.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I understand the Senator to say that he is opposed to a service pension to the soldiers of the Mexican war because it may result in giving a service pension to soldiers of the late war. Is that his idea?

Mr. CAMDEN. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that there are exceptions to the rule, which I might concede if it was prudent or expedient to do it at this time. There is a great difference between pensioning soldiers forty years after the service and pensioning soldiers twenty years after the service. In forty years after the service the soldier has become an old man; he may be in suffering or may be decrepit; but a service pension to the soldier of the war for the Union would be entirely a bounty on the part of the Government, and the Government should have a discretion as to when it will extend that bounty, and in my judgment it ought not at this time to be extended at all.

We are not voting away our own money; we are voting away the money of the people of this country; and the people of this country are composed three-fourths or almost nine-tenths of laboring men. We should place proper limits to the bounty that the Government should extend in any and in all instances.

There are in this country engaged in agricultural pursuits, in round numbers, seven millions of people; there are in mines and manufacturing interests some four millions of people; there are in other laboring pursuits about five millions more people, making in the aggregate sixteen millions of laboring people, one-half of whom perhaps are less able to make their own living, let alone contribute bounties to others, than the average of the soldiers who came out of the war uninjured.

Mr. LOGAN. The soldiers are nearly all laboring men themselves.

Mr. CAMDEN. I know they are, but we are taxing one class of laboring men in the interest of another class of laboring men.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. CAMDEN. I appreciate the spirit of patriotism which governed those men in going into the Army. I appreciate the spirit of patriotism which has been displayed by our volunteer soldiers on every occasion when the country has demanded their services; but that spirit is not promoted by encouraging the idea of extraordinary compensation to those men. You degrade the spirit of patriotism to one of pecuniary interest.

I believe, as I said before, that the Government owes it to every soldier who has been in its service and has been disabled or wounded in that service, or whose health has been impaired from that service, to grant a liberal and generous pension to him, but I think that our bounty ought to end at that point.

I shall vote against all amendments looking to an increase of our pension-roll, and I shall vote against the bill itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. He was called away from the Senate, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is engaged in the Committee on Appropriations and requested me to pair with him. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who is unavoidably absent from the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] requested me to announce his pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] on these questions.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY].

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 1.

Mr. HOAR. That is not in order now.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the question now to be on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to lay that amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. HAWLEY. Can we have that amendment read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the first section of the bill:

Provided further, That no pension paid under any law hereafter shall be rated at less than $4 per month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 15, noes 24.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment just agreed to the following proviso:

And provided also, That no payment of any increase of expenditures for pensions under this act shall be made from the Treasury until provision shall be made by law to meet such increase of expenditure by a tax upon incomes specifically applicable thereto.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALDRICH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when Mr. ALLISON'S name was called). The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] requested me to announce a pair between him and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. COKE'S name was called). The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired on all these questions with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. HEARST (after having voted in the negative). I see that my colleague [Mr. STANFORD] is out of the Chamber, and it is understood that we are paired when either of us is away. So I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Blair,	Hale,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Miller,	Van Wyck,
Brown,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Voorhees,

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask at this time the consent of the Senate to have two or three merely verbal amendments made. In section 1, line 15, after the word "disability," the words "and dependence" should be inserted. The pension is made payable on two conditions, disability and dependence, and in that line the words "and dependence" have been improperly omitted. I ask that the words be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 15, after the word "disability," it is proposed to insert the words "and dependence;" so as to read:

And be entitled to receive a pension during the continuance of such disability and dependence.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, by the use of the words "and dependence," in line 15, it will be necessary, in line 16, for him to change the word "thereof" to the words "of such disability," so as to make it good grammar and good sense.

Mr. BLAIR. That change should be made. I thank the Senator from Ohio for the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will state the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 16, it is proposed to strike out the word "thereof" and insert the words "of such disability;" so as to read:

And be entitled to receive a pension during the continuance of such disability and dependence at a rate proportionate to the degree of such disability.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Are there any degrees of dependence?

Mr. BLAIR. There are none now. If there are amendments on that matter they will come in later, and will apply, if the Senator should choose to move them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. In the twentieth line of the first section, after the words "twenty-four dollars," the words "per month" should be inserted; so as to read:

The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. The second section, commencing in line 8, now reads:

And such as may be found to be entitled to $8 a month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 a month from and after the approval of this act.

I wish to insert after the word "laws," at the commencement of the tenth line, the words "as modified by this section," this section being created to include another class.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 10, after the word "laws," it is proposed to insert the words "as modified by this section;" so as to read:

And such as may be found to be entitled to $8 a month under existing laws as modified by this section shall receive in lieu thereof $12 a month from and after the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend, in the tenth line of the first section, by striking out, after the word "own," the words "gross carelessness, disreputable conduct, or vicious habits," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fault;" so as to read:

And who is or shall become disabled from any cause not the result of his own fault, and shall also be dependent upon his own labor for support.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In section 1, line 7, before the word "months," I move to strike out the word "six" and insert the word "three;" so as to read:

That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the amendments thereto, who served in the military or naval service, as mentioned in said section, for the period of three months during the war of the rebellion, &c.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that amendment will be accepted. Is the Senator from Illinois going to speak to it?

Mr. LOGAN. I was not going to say anything except that I know myself, of my own knowledge, numbers of men who did not serve six months who would be as much deserving of a pension under this bill as a man who served five years, for they were in battles, and in heavy battles. If they are not disabled they will not get any pension under the amendment I propose, and if they are disabled they are as much entitled to a pension as if they had served six months.

Mr. BLAIR. As this bill passed the Senate in the last Congress it was precisely as it would be if amended as moved by the Senator from Illinois. Although the committee considered the matter and inserted the words "six months" on deliberation, yet I know the fact to be that of the three-months men who fought the first battle of Bull Run and who exhibited as great patriotism certainly as any of our soldiers did, being the very first to enlist, very many would be excluded from the provisions of this act unless the amendment be made. I have received several letters since the bill was reported from that class, and I hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. HAWLEY. Nobody objects to it.

Mr. CULLOM. We are all for it.

Mr. LOGAN. Unanimously.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well. I will say no more. I thought some one objected to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. In section 1, at the end of line 11, after the word "support," I move to insert the words:

Or upon the contributions of others not legally bound thereto.

So as to read:

And who is or shall become disabled from any cause not the result of his own fault, and shall also be dependent upon his own labor for support, or upon the contributions of others not legally bound thereto, shall upon making due proof of the facts, &c.

Those words are in the second section, and apply already to dependent parents, and unless they be placed in the first section the bill would be inoperative to those who are entirely disabled, and who for that reason, having been disabled for any length of time, can not be said to be dependent upon their own labor, since they are utterly incompetent to perform any labor. It could not be said that a man is dependent upon his own labor for support who can not perform any labor whatever and who is supported by charity. Therefore I think these words should be in, and I suppose they will be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no further amendment be proposed the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I offered an amendment which I should like to have read and acted upon at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the names of all the surviving officers, soldiers, and sailors who enlisted and served in the war with Mexico for any period during the years 1845, 1846, 1847, and 1848, and were honorably discharged, and their surviving widows, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the passage of this act, during their lives. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry this act into effect: Provided, That where it shall appear that a discharge is lost, secondary evidence may be permitted; and where it shall appear an applicant has received a land warrant, that shall be sufficient evidence of an honorable discharge, unless the evidence shows that he procured it by fraud: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to persons under political disabilities.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Let the latter clause be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will read the latter clause of the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That this act shall not apply to persons under political disabilities.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President.

Mr. BUTLER. I asked for the yeas and nays. Why not take a direct vote?

Mr. BLAIR. I want to say just a word. I do not care to open any discussion, but I wish the country and the Senate to understand that the committee has reported the House Mexican pension bill, the precise measure which has been read at the desk as an amendment to this bill. It is considerably modified it is true, but it is in the condition of a House bill in the possession of the Senate, and in some form, I have no doubt, will be passed by the Senate; and the committee are disposed to act in the utmost good faith and with such celerity as the sentiment of the Senate will permit them to do in pressing it for consideration. It has been reported in precisely the form in which it was passed by the Senate in the last Congress.

I think the Senate will wish to modify the bill as it came from the House considerably if they pass it. For instance, it requires no definite period of service whatever as a condition for the payment of what is a service pension purely, and there are other particulars in which the bill was not satisfactory, I may say properly, perhaps, to the minority members of the Committee on Pensions, or at least to some of them. It was objected to. The House bill which was reported to the Senate comes here as much by the action of the minority members of that committee as the majority.

For my own part I am personally in favor of giving the soldiers of the Mexican war a service pension, although I have on former occasions opposed it, but a majority of the committee decided that the bill should be reported in the form in which it comes to the Senate, which makes it a service pension absolute to all who are sixty-two years of age; and to those who are less than sixty-two years of age, in order that they may receive the pension provided, it is necessary that they shall prove disability and dependence in analogy to the provisions of the pending bill.

If this amendment should be placed upon the pending bill, or if the fate of the soldiers of the Mexican war should be made to depend upon the fate of this bill, the Senator from South Carolina will himself see that there is greater uncertainty as to the result of this measure than if we deal with the House bill, which we may amend and simply send back for concurrence in the amendments. This bill has yet to run the gauntlet of the House and of the Presidential action.

I think the Senator will himself after this statement perceive that if I should move to lay his amendment upon the table it could not be said that I did so with any unfriendly feeling toward the class of men who would be affected by it.

Mr. MILLER. But rather in their interest.

Mr. BLAIR. It is rather in their interest; and if the Senator from South Carolina does not desire to say anything more, I will make the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I have nothing to say whatever in reply to what the Senator has just stated.

Mr. BLAIR. Perhaps the Senator will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. No, I shall not withdraw it; but if what the Senator says is true, and I have no doubt it is true, the Senate Committee on Pensions having reported the Mexican pension bill which came from the House, and proposing to have action upon it as early as possible, it will not in the slightest degree injure that measure by adopting the amendment I have proposed to the pending bill.

Mr. BLAIR. But it would injure this measure very seriously, and might excite opposition to the passage of the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. BUTLER. No, I think very likely it would strengthen it. It would in my estimation, I have no hesitation in saying, strengthen this bill very much.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will see that the Mexican pension bill has reached the Senate and does not meet with adverse action from some who formerly opposed it.

Mr. BUTLER. It simply gives to the Mexican pension bill two chances instead of one, and therefore I shall insist upon a vote upon my amendment. If the Senate votes it down, of course I shall have nothing to say.

Mr. BLAIR. But it will injure this bill, and I trust my motion to lay on the table will prevail. I withhold the motion, however, as the Senator from Illinois wishes to speak.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to say just one word. I am a friend of the Mexican pension bill. I have always voted for it, and I shall do so whenever it comes up. I made a speech here once in opposition to putting amendments upon it, because I wanted each measure to stand upon its own basis.

For that reason I shall vote against this amendment, although I shall vote for the bill when it comes up as it is presented from the committee or in some form or other, and in the best form that I can get it for the benefit of those soldiers. But to put it in this bill, with the minimum to Union soldiers limited in the bill to $4 and the pension of the soldiers of the Mexican war fixed at $8, I do not think would fit very well; and I should not like to put the measures together in that shape; for if a man who served in the Mexican war is entitled to $8 a month without any disability whatever, it seems to me that a man with disability who served in the Union Army is entitled to the same rate of pension. It was on that principle that I offered my amendment. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment, or in favor of laying it on the table, if the Senator from New Hampshire makes that motion.

Mr. BLAIR. I make the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 17; as follows:

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. BLAIR. When the discussion opened I gave notice that I would move to insert before the word "labor," in the eleventh line of the first section, at the top of the second page, the word "manual;" but the discussion having indicated, and my own understanding now being, that the language as it stands would be held to include persons disabled and dependent upon their labor, whether it was that of a teacher or a physician or a clergyman dependent upon the exercise of his usual pursuit in life, I will not make the motion to insert that word. I think the bill ought to be construed, and as it stands will be construed to include all who are dependent upon their usual avocation in life for the means of sustenance and who are disabled. Therefore I withhold the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to make a suggestion in that particular? It is very clear to my mind that as the bill now stands no persons will be entitled to its benefits, should it become a law, except those who being disabled are dependent upon their own manual labor for support. I know of no reason why that rule should be applied. A man who has been a soldier and who is a physician or a clergyman or a lawyer or an editor or a merchant or a teacher, being disabled and dependent and unable to pursue his avocation, ought to receive the benefits of this bill exactly the same as a man who follows the plow or makes shoes or manufactures iron in the forge.

I therefore suggest to the Senator whether he will not consent to strike out the whole of line 11, which would certainly include all those who are at present by a technical construction included and give the other people a chance; and if he will not consent to that, whether he does not think it would be advisable to substitute for the word "labor" the word "exertion;" so as to read:

And shall also be dependent upon his own exertion for support.

Mr. BLAIR. If that is the best word to put there, I have no objection to the change. It occurred to me that "his usual avocation or calling in life" would be better.

Mr. INGALLS. I should say either "exertion" or "effort." Either of these words would be a great deal more comprehensive than the word "labor" as it is understood in the common acceptation of that term and the legal acceptation as well. Therefore, if the Senator desires to extend the benefits of this bill to all who are disabled and who would be entitled to claim, no matter what may be their pursuit in life, if he would use either of those two words he would include all those that are now included and extend the benefits of the act probably to those who are now by the terms of the act itself excluded.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will move to insert the word "exertion" instead of "labor," I shall not oppose it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kansas as offering an amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir. In line 11 of section 1 I move to strike out the word "labor" and insert the word "exertion;" so as to read:

And shall also be dependent upon his own exertion for support.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no objection so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. Before the vote is taken on this bill I desire to make a few remarks giving the reasons which will control my vote on its final passage.

Mr. President, after the termination of the late unfortunate civil war, when the Southern States composing the confederacy had been conquered, the Government, standing in the capacity of victor, dictated the terms upon which the Southern States could resume their place in the Union with all the rights and privileges of States of the Union. The Southern people and Southern States accepted those terms, and whatever may be said of the terms, or of the delays which occurred, or the evils of the reconstruction period, the terms were in fact accepted by the Southern people, and the authority of the Government was re-established with all the States as members of the Union.

In this state of things the Southern States again became a component part of the Union, and the Southern people citizens of their respective States and citizens of the United States, with all the rights, privileges, and immunities, and with all the duties and obligations of other citizens.

The fourteenth constitutional amendment, which was assented to by the Southern States, contains a provision that the validity of the debt of the United States, including debts incurred for the payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred by insurrection or rebellion against the United States or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave, but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held to be illegal and void.

By the terms of this constitutional amendment, agreed to by both sides, it becomes the duty of the Southern people to act in the matter of pensions to Union soldiers precisely as they would have acted if they had been on the Union side in the contest and the Union soldiers had been their soldiers. In other words, Southern Senators and Representatives in Congress are bound to act toward the Union soldiers in matters of pensions just as they would have acted if the Southern States had been part of the Union and fighting for the Union during the civil strife, or just as we would act toward them if the war had been against a foreign power and they had been fighting the battles of the Government.

Now, if I am correct in this view, as long as the people of the Northern States, who were in the Union and fighting for the Union during the contest, feel that there is still anything due the soldiers as pensions which has not been paid by the Government, and as long as Northern tax-payers are content with the passage of laws increasing pensions, I do not think the people of the South can object.

I have no doubt there are a great many tax-payers in the Northern States who do not approve the extent to which the Government has gone in the matter of pensions; but as the Northern constituencies continue to send Senators and Representatives to Congress who, without regard to party lines or party divisions, vote almost solidly for additional pension bills, we have no right to conclude that the majority of the Northern tax-payers disapprove such action; and it is reasonable to suppose if the South had been in the Union at the time and the Union Army had been considered their army that they would have gone as far in granting the soldiers pensions as the people of the Northern States would have gone. While, therefore, I feel that we are going to an extent the propriety of which is questionable, I will yield any doubt I may entertain as to the wisdom and propriety of this measure and give the benefit of the doubt in its favor as long as the representatives of both political parties North are almost solid in their support. And believing that to be true in the present instance, I expect to vote for the bill. But before I take my seat I desire to remark that our soldiers who served in the war against Mexico, which occurred nearly fifteen years prior to the late civil war and about forty years ago, have not yet received service pensions.

Very large numbers of the Mexican soldiers are dead, and those who survive are mostly becoming old and many of them decrepit.

I think while Southern Senators and Representatives have, as a rule, faithfully sustained measures for pensioning Union soldiers, Northern Senators and Representatives should consider with more liberality the claims of the soldiers against Mexico. It is true, I believe, that a majority of them were from the Southern States, and that the South would get part of the benefit if that act should pass.

Those gallant men were fighting the battles of this Government against a foreign foe, and their gallantry and success added an empire of territory to the Republic. Why, then, should we continue to decline to grant them pensions?

When forty years have passed from the commencement of the late civil war, I have no doubt service pensions will be granted to all the Union surviving soldiers engaged in it, possibly at an earlier period. I trust the soldiers against Mexico may be kindly and justly dealt with without further delay, and I do not think I shall vote in future for further increase of pensions to Union soldiers until something just and reasonable has been done for them.

And in this connection I desire to remark that the Government, in my opinion, owes the same duty to the soldiers who, at a still earlier period, fought our battles against the Indians.

There are in my State still some old men, the survivors of the soldiers who fought our Indian battles. The number is comparatively small, and they are generally old and needy. I think provision should be made for them, and I trust Northern Senators and Representatives, as well as Southern Senators and Representatives, will consider maturely the obligation which the Government is under to them, and see that full justice is done them.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think the speech of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] should not pass without a statement of fact in connection with it.

The pension for the Mexican soldiers would have passed six or eight years ago if it were not for the fact that that side of the Chamber unanimously, with the exception of one or two Senators only, refused to accept a proposition for pensioning those soldiers which contained a provision that no pension should be paid to Jefferson Davis. It was their fault, not the fault of this side of the Chamber unless they expected us to pension Mr. Davis, that that bill did not pass at that time. Later the same Senators refused to accept a bill providing for pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war, which this side of the Chamber was ready to support, but which put them precisely on the footing on which the soldiers of the Revolution were placed for more than forty years after the close of the Revolutionary war, and precisely on the footing that the soldiers of the war of 1812 were placed down to 1873 or 1874, fifty-six or fifty-eight years after the conclusion of that war.

The soldiers of the Revolution were required until nearly fifty years after its close to state in their application that the person applying was in need of a pension, and the general service pension treating age as a universal disability was not applied to the soldiers of the Revolution or to the soldiers of the war of 1812 until a longer interval had passed since the close of that war than has now passed since the close of the Mexican war.

So that pension bill failed on account of the claim and demand from that side of the Chamber, represented almost wholly by Southern Senators, that the soldiers of the Mexican war should be put in a better condition than the soldiers of the Revolution were placed in or than the soldiers of 1812 were placed in. They claimed, as some Senators did, that it was a degradation to a soldier to have to state in his application that he needed a pension. If it were a degradation, then we have degraded the widows and dependent fathers and mothers of the soldiers of the war of the Union; then we have degraded the soldiers of the war of the Revolution and the soldiers of the war of 1812.

The failure to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war before this time is due not to this side of the Chamber, not to the representatives of the Northern States of the Union; it is due as a matter of history to the Senators who denied, first, that a pension bill which excluded Jeff Davis should be passed by the representatives of this Government, and who afterward rejected a bill which placed them on the same footing with the soldiers of the war of the Revolution and of the war of 1812, and on the same footing with the widows and dependent parents of the soldiers of the war for the Union.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] needs, I think, a little explanation.

As to the first bill to which the Senator alludes I know nothing. I was not a member of this body at the time when it was discussed and failed.

As to the second bill, if my recollection is not at fault, the Senate passed a bill, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, which was not wholly consistent with the position assigned by him to Senators on this side.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me for saying that the bill to which I referred as the second bill, to which I suppose he is now coming, was the measure which was in charge of the late Senator from Kentucky, General Williams.

Mr. GEORGE. I refer to that bill. The failure of that bill was not wholly due to the action of Senators on this side of the Chamber. In the first place, I remember very well that both my then colleague, Mr. Lamar, and myself were advocating and supporting the bill in the shape in which the Senator says it was distasteful to this side of the Chamber. In the next place, if I am not very much mistaken (and if I am I shall be glad to be corrected), the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] made the same objection to what was then denounced as the pauper clause of that bill as was made by General Williams, the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], and some other Senators on this side. The Senator from Illinois nods assent to that proposition. I was willing, and my former colleague was always willing, to accept the pensioning of the Mexican war soldiers upon the basis finally assumed in the bill to which the Senator from Massachusetts has alluded. I believe that if it had not been for the great weight and large influence of the Senator from Illinois, notwithstanding the objections urged upon this side of the Chamber, that bill might have passed.

And now one word more. I intend to vote for the bill now before the Senate. I shall vote for it under no constraint whatever. I shall vote for it cheerfully, and because I believe it to be my duty as an American Senator to vote for it. If there be any consequences to fall on me personally for that, I am ready to meet them. I have only cast one vote on the various amendments which have been proposed which I need to explain, and I ask now to explain it.

When the proposition was made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] to insert a proviso restraining the operation of this bill until a law was passed raising revenue sufficient from incomes to pay the debt, I voted against it; and for these reasons: In the first place I regarded it as an obstructive amendment to the passage of the bill, and being in favor of the bill, I did not propose to encumber it by amendments that would tend to defeat it.

In the second place I desire to say that I am now and I have been for a long time very profoundly impressed with the injustice of the tax laws of the Union. I have been very profoundly impressed with the truth of the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] this morning, that most of the large revenue which we collect and disburse is collected from that class of our population who are least able to pay it; and I have also been impressed with the conviction that it was the duty of the American Congress to impose further taxation upon what is called the accumulated wealth of the country. In accordance with that conviction I have favored and I now favor the imposition of income taxes and of other taxes which would more equally impose the burdens of taxation upon all classes. But the Senate has no right to originate a measure of that sort. All revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives; and notwithstanding my convictions as to the propriety of taxation of that sort, and my readiness to vote for taxation of that kind whenever I have the legitimate opportunity to cast that vote, I felt, for the reason which I have just stated, that it was my duty to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, on the 8th of December, 1885, I introduced a bill (S. 35) to remove the limitation in the payment of arrears of pensions, which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, where it has reposed now for a period of nearly six months without apparent action, and, so far as I am advised, without any response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] directing that committee to report that bill to the Senate for its action.

This subject is one that is very near to my heart. As the author of the original measure in 1879 for the removal of the limitation on the payment of arrears of pension, having consented with reluctance to the limitation that was imposed fixing the time beyond which their payment should not be made at the 1st of July, 1880, I have never ceased to hope and labor for the time when that act of injustice would be repaired; and I believe that of all questions which are now pending upon this matter before the people of this country there is none in which so large a number of men are profoundly and actively interested as in this measure to which I have thus called the attention of the Senate.

I do not desire in any way whatever to impede or hinder or retard or delay action upon the measure now before the Senate. I am in favor of the proposition as it has been amended, and if I can receive any assurance that there will be such action on the part of the Committee on Pensions as will enable the Senate to act upon this bill I shall not propose this as an amendment to the pending measure; but unless there has been some action taken or is likely to be some action taken so that definite assurance may be had that this bill is not to sleep in that committee but to be reported to the Senate for its action, I feel that it is an imperative duty upon me to offer this proposition as an amendment to the pending bill, and I wait to hear from the chairman of the committee to know whether there is any likelihood, whether he can give me any assurance that there is a probability that in response to the resolution of the Senate this bill will be shortly reported either with a favorable report or with an adverse report—I do not care which—so that we may have the opportunity of discussing it as an independent measure for future consideration. I wait for a reply.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the Senator as well as the Senate is aware that the chairman of the committee, nearly three months since, I think, was by reason of ill health obliged to leave the city, and since that time has been either at his home or in a neighboring city for medical treatment, and in his absence I have, as well as I could, acted as chairman and helped to get on with the business of the committee as rapidly as I could.

In regard to the particular bill that the Senator from Kansas refers to, I remember on four occasions I have brought that bill to the attention of the committee, being myself anxious that the bill should be acted upon favorably, if at all. The conditions were such on the first three of these occasions that I felt that perhaps the ultimate interest of the measure would be conserved by avoiding action by the committee for the time being at least. When the Senator from Illinois offered the motion, about two weeks since, in the Senate that the Committee on Pensions be requested to report that bill there was no action by the Senate which emphasized its anxiety for a report. As I recollect, the attendance was thin, and while there was no opposition there were but one or two votes in favor of the passage of the resolution. But still it was a resolution of the Senate, and attention was called to it at the very next meeting of the committee, which was a week ago last Tuesday.

The committee was not inclined at that time to report the measure favorably; and finally it was decided that it would not at that time report it at all, but that a call should be made upon the Commissioner of Pensions to ascertain his estimates of the probable expenditure under the terms of the bill should it become a law. That call was made immediately. The letter was written during the session of the committee, signed by myself, and immediately forwarded. The reply came the day that the discussion commenced upon this bill, and the contents of that reply I gave to the Senate in that discussion, so that the Senate and the committee might avail themselves of the information at once.

At the last meeting of the committee we took up the bill for consideration. We first acted upon the Mexican pension bill and then took up the arrears bill for consideration, and the final vote was postponed until the next meeting of the committee. I am not able to give the Senator any assurance that that final vote, if such indications as I have observed are reliable as a prophecy for the future, will be a favorable vote to the bill; but I think that the committee is determined to act and report the measure back to the possession of the Senate, so that the Senate may deal with it as it shall see fit. I do not know that I am authorized to say that the measure will be reported back without recommendation, but I think there may be some probability of that action.

Mr. SEWELL. My recollection is that we were to report the bill to the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator was not present at the last meeting. The Senator's recollection is different from my own. There was no action that I am aware of. What was the Senator's impression as to the nature of that report?

Mr. SEWELL. Without recommendation.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not understand it so, but there will be no hesitation in returning the bill to the possession of the Senate without recommendation, or possibly with a recommendation.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is not the Senator from New Hampshire able, from his knowledge of the committee, to state distinctly and unqualifiedly that that bill will be reported back to the Senate with or without recommendation?

Mr. BLAIR. I have so stated.

Mr. VAN WYCK. You stated that you thought so.

Mr. BLAIR. I am not authorized to say that the bill will be reported back to the Senate, but I am authorized to say that I have not the slightest doubt of it, and that a formal vote was postponed until the next meeting, several Senators having passed out from the committee-room before we were able to reach a vote. The Senate will have the bill, though. I warrant you that.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, after the observations I submitted a short time ago the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] obtained the floor and made some remarks, and then the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] took the floor. While he was occupying the floor I was called out for a few moments from the Chamber and the Senate passed to the consideration of something else before I returned. I simply take the floor now to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that in the remarks I made I did not intend to imply censure to any party on account of anything that had been done in reference to the Mexican pension bill, but only to make an appeal to both parties to pass a just bill in behalf of the survivors of that war.

Whether the time had come heretofore, or whether we have agreed or disagreed about it, I trust we shall all agree now that the time has come when service pensions ought to be granted to the survivors of the Mexican war; and without desiring to stir up any strife or to make any accusations or to blame anybody in the past, I desire to renew the appeal in their behalf and again to express the hope that the bill which was reported by the committee in proper shape will be passed. I intended no censure.

Mr. HOAR. I did not understand the Senator from Georgia to imply any censure upon anybody, and I did not make any remarks with the view of repelling any censure or making any on my side; but there is a great misunderstanding in some portions of the country, which I have seen myself the evidence of very extensively in the press, and in letters from Mexican veterans, and in the reports of meetings of such veterans, more particularly in the South, in regard to that matter. It should be distinctly understood by the country and by the Mexican war soldiers, first, that a veteran of the Mexican war receives to-day, and has been able to receive ever since a brief period after the close of that war, a pension upon terms which would give it to any soldier in any other war. There is no condition which would enable a soldier of the war for the Union or a soldier of the war of the Revolution or of the war of 1812 to obtain a pension which being applicable to a soldier of the Mexican war would not give him a pension. I do not think that is generally understood.

It is further true that but for the objections I stated, which came almost wholly from Senators from the South, though one or two Northern Senators may have shared them—I do not think the Senator from Illinois was one so far as to object to the bill on the ground which I stated or to express himself in favor of so doing—every survivor of the Mexican war would have been pensioned long ago whose circumstances were such as to make him need a pension. I wanted to have that understood by the country.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that, if I am not mistaken, the Mexican pension bill to which he refers was never put on its passage in this body as a Mexican pension bill.

Mr. HOAR. That bill was in charge of a late Senator from Kentucky, whom we all remember with respect, General Williams, himself a veteran of that war and a veteran on the confederate side in the late war; and General Williams knew very well that the Republican side of the Senate were ready to pass his bill if the same condition were attached to it which was attached to the pension bill for the soldiers of the Revolution; and while he did not bring it up for a vote, he did make speech after speech upon the subject in which he rejected that modification.

Mr. GEORGE. This is the fact about that, if I am not mistaken, that after those objections were made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and by Senators on this side the bill was then amended by attaching to it something like the present bill now before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. And then it passed the Senate?

Mr. GEORGE. And the bill as thus amended passed this body.

Mr. HOAR. That is true.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I wish to say a word not in the way of general debate, for I have said all I propose in that line, but I want to notice a remark of the Senator from Mississippi.

I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, as did many gentlemen on this side of the Chamber. I did not for a moment think that any constitutional question as to the origination of a revenue measure was involved in that amendment, and I say now such question can not be possibly involved. The language of the amendment is as follows:

Provided, That no payment of any increase of expenditures for pensions under this act shall be made from the Treasury until provision shall be made by law to meet such increase of expenditure by a tax upon incomes specifically applicable thereto.

As a matter of course the originating of this income tax would come from the House of Representatives; but this amendment simply goes to the extent of providing that until, according to the Constitution, the income tax shall be created, these pensions shall not be paid. If by any sort of forced construction that can be held to announce the doctrine that the Senate can originate a revenue bill, I confess I do not understand the force of the English language.

Mr. HARRIS. Is there any tax imposed by the amendment?

Mr. VEST. Not a bit; that is a matter subsequent and to be regulated by law.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course.

Mr. GEORGE. By the very few remarks I made I did not expect to get up a debate on a constitutional question; but as the Senator from Missouri has denied the correctness of my position I will respond to his statement, I think very satisfactorily.

The Constitution of the United States provides that all bills to raise money shall originate in the House of Representatives. That gives the House of Representatives the exclusive right of the initiation of money bills. Now for this body in a bill passed by it making an appropriation which the amendment itself assumes to be a proper one, to limit that appropriation, to say it shall not take effect unless the House of Representatives shall originate a proposition to raise a tax in a certain way, it seems to me is an attempt upon the part of the Senate to coerce the House of Representatives into the origination of a tax law. It may not be strictly a violation of the Constitution of the United States, but it is a violation of its spirit. It is not within the power of this body in the discharge of a public duty, as that amendment admits the passage of this bill to be, to say it will not discharge that duty unless the House of Representatives will bring in a tax measure of a certain character.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Mississippi will point out one line or syllable or letter of this amendment which provides for any appropriation or the creation of any tax then I should certainly apologize to him in the most public and ample manner, but this is simply a condition which may arise in the future or may not. If the House of Representatives sees proper to originate an income tax hereafter, then this amendment would become operative. Until the House of Representatives does it under the Constitution and according to law, then the amendment is inoperative, and that is the whole of it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to say a single word. I shall not be charged with taking up much of the time of the Senate.

I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware. I voted to lay it on the table, because I knew that a vote in favor of that amendment was a vote against this bill. I do not believe there is the remotest probability at this time of the House of Representatives originating or Congress passing an income tax; and consequently the proposition that this bill should be non-effective until such a law is enacted to my mind would be giving a vote which I have at no time intended to give on this matter.

Now, a single word on the subject of the income tax, so that I may not be misunderstood. I voted for the creation of the income tax in the other House of Congress a good many years ago, and I was one of the few who voted against its repeal when it disappeared from the statute-book. I remember that nearly everybody was stampeded by the difficulties of collecting an income tax, and the cogent and somewhat peculiar argument in favor of its repeal was the enormous amount of perjury which men committed to avoid the payment of an income tax. I believe in a tax on incomes. I believe it is an honest method of raising revenue, and I think I would be, upon a fair proposition coming forward in a legitimate way, for a well-regulated income tax, and take the chances for the loss of souls by perjury in trying to evade it, which seemed to be the great argument at the time of the repeal in favor of its repeal.

This much I desired to say, and no more.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. PAYNE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the next special order, which is the bill (S. 714) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to make a report——

Mr. SEWELL. I ask leave to take up the next two bills on the Calendar, which relate to pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois was recognized.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5886) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, to report it without amendment. I desire to have that bill acted on now. I will state to the Senate that there is not a change in it as reported. We have taken the bill precisely as it came from the House of Representatives and reported it, and I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate to explain it. I will only say that it is a reduction of some $12,000 from last year's bill. There are some things in it I would amend if it was left to me; but the committee thought it best to report the bill as it came from the House, inasmuch as there is nothing very material that we would desire to change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the special order, the Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill just reported. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill (H. R. 5886) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It will be read.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the reading of this bill the Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope not. We shall get this bill through in ten minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], and withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. VEST. I announce my pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the negative). I voted, but am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. He desires an executive session, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. EUSTIS. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Beck,	Call,	Hampton,	Walthall,
Berry,	Colquitt.	Hoar,	Whitthorne.
Blackburn,	George,	Jones of Arkansas,
Brown,	Gibson,	Riddleberger,

NAYS—26.

Aldrich,	Gray,	Miller,	Sawyer,
Butler,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Sewell,
Chace,	Ingalls,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Conger,	Logan,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Dolph,	McMillan,	Palmer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Frye,	Mahone,	Payne,
Gorman,	Manderson,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—36.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Blair,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Evarts,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Camden,	Fair,	Maxey,	Teller,
Cameron,	Hale,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pike,	Van Wyck,
Coke,	Hawley,	Platt,	Vest,
Cullom,	Hearst,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator to withhold that for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the motion if the Senator from Iowa will renew it.

GEORGE W. CRAMBLETT.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely wish to make a request. Yesterday the bill (H. R. 6000) granting a pension to George W. Cramblett was reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions and indefinitely postponed. I ask unanimous consent that that vote may be reconsidered and the bill placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the vote indefinitely postponing the bill named by him be reconsidered, and that it be placed on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I desire to have the appropriation bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 5886) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that this bill only displaces the bankruptcy bill informally. It is not a laying aside of it.

Mr. LOGAN. It will not take ten minutes to pass this.

Mr. HOAR. It will be so understood by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the bankruptcy bill prior to the close of the day's session.

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator from Illinois when this bill was considered in committee? I thought I attended every meeting.

Mr. LOGAN. It was considered the other day in your absence.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon; I was absent. My colleague on the committee from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] tells me he never heard of it, and I never heard of it. We had no notice about it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] will bear in mind that I stated to him about it and he gave his assent to it, though he was not present when it was considered in committee. It was rather informally considered, I agree. If there is any objection to it I trust the Senator from Illinois will give these gentlemen an opportunity to investigate it.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; I have not the slightest objection to the bill being recommitted to the committee if anybody desires it. It was submitted to a subcommittee; we considered it; the subcommittee agreed to it, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] being one of them. He said that whatever the rest of us agreed to would be satisfactory to him. So I reported the bill back. We agreed to the bill exactly as it came from the House, and I was instructed to report it, and I have done so. If there is any desire to have the bill recommitted I have no objection.

Mr. BECK. I do not desire to have a recommittal of the bill; but calling up a bill at twenty minutes to six and putting it through without a word of explanation is not usual.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Illinois will have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LOGAN. I will do so. I move that it be recommitted. I have prepared a written report.

Mr. BECK. If the report is read, I shall be content.

Mr. LOGAN. I intended to have it read after the bill was read. I have a written report and statement showing every dollar expended last year and this year, and a comparative statement showing everything there is in the bill, which I intended to put in the RECORD so that everybody could see it.

Mr. BECK. The reason why I made the inquiry was that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and myself were on the board of visitors last year and we made quite a number of recommendations in our written report of changes and improvements which ought to be made, some of which I desire to call attention to. They were submitted quite elaborately and the reasons for them were presented at length. I did not know whether they were included in this bill or not; and I desire to hear the report read, because if they are I am content.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask leave to say one word on this subject, as I am on the committee.

It has been stated to the Senate that I had not remembered the fact of this bill having been considered in committee. I did make that remark. I had no recollection at the time, however, that the chairman of the committee had called my attention to the fact that the bill would be reported as it came from the House. I now remember that.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the bill be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been already recommitted.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask if mine is not a motion that has priority? It may not, of course, when I make it; I understand that perfectly well, especially when the Senator from Michigan proposes to make any other motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business a motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I then withdraw my motion, but I should like, if the Senator from Michigan would allow me, to have permission to state just now that my object in making the motion is that the Senate shall understand that I do it at a time when nobody can object to it except some one who wants to go to dinner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 20, at 12 o'clock m.

RETURN OF BILLS TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, May 18, 1886.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this request will be granted, and the bill will be returned to the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, May 18, 1886.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the resolution of the Senate of May 17, 1886, agreeing to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1227) granting an increase of pension to William P. Squires.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection this request of the Senate will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BYNUM, for ten days.

To Mr. FORAN, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

REPRINTING OF A REPORT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request:

Mr. BELMONT desires to have House Report No. 1938, to accompany House bill No. 6520, to reform and reorganize the consular service, reprinted for the use of the House, the copies heretofore printed having been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection this report will be reprinted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the House Calendar for present consideration Senate bill 91, to amend an act entitled "An act to grant a right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes."

Mr. BLOUNT. Under instructions from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads I must call for the regular order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman well understands that this day is set apart for debate on a bill which may not be debated at any other time, while the gentleman can seek the floor any morning to bring up the bill he has indicated.

SEWELL COULSON AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER. By mistake Senate bill No. 249, for the payment of Sewell Coulson and Porter, Harrison & Fishback for legal services, was referred to the Committee on War Claims. If there be no objection, that committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

FEES OF WITNESSES AND JURORS.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations. The committee to which was referred a resolution making inquiry whether fees of witnesses and jurors for 1883 and prior years have all been paid, has directed me to report the same back with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House whether all fees of witnesses and of jurors, for 1883 and prior years, have been paid, and, if not, what amount thereof remain unpaid, and whether appropriations are available for the payment of the same.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania ask for the reading of the report accompanying the resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. I think it had better be read, or else inserted in the RECORD. The resolution proposed to call for information which the Committee on Appropriations think is already in the possession of the House, and the report gives references to the documents in which that information can be found.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the report will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the resolution of inquiry calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to "inform the House whether all fees of witnesses and of jurors for 1883 and prior years have been paid, and, if not, what amount thereof remain unpaid, and whether appropriations are available for the payment of the same," submit the following statement:

The information sought is already in the possession of the House and is contained in the House executive documents of this session, numbered 70, 210, and 225, showing that claims for witness' fees amounting to $3,171.66 and for jurors' fees amounting to $87.70 for 1883 and prior years have been allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and are certified to Congress for consideration in compliance with section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884 (23 Statutes, page 254). Under the operation of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, there are now no appropriations available for the payment of these claims; the section referred to being as follows:

"That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, and of each year thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of appropriations which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury."

The committee recommend that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The question being taken on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations that the resolution be laid on the table, it was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the formal call of committees be dispensed with to-day, and that in lieu thereof the Speaker be authorized to recognize such gentlemen as may have reports to make.

Mr. BEACH. I think we gain no time by that arrangement, and it creates confusion at the desk. I shall have to object. I call for the regular order.

The Speaker proceeded to call the standing and select committees for reports to be referred to the appropriate calendars.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT DUBUQUE, IOWA.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 8141, a bill (H. R. 8973) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill 8141 was, by unanimous consent, laid on the table.

CHEYENNE AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CAREY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 8037) to authorize the Cheyenne and Northern Railway Company to build its road across the Fort Russell and Fort Laramie military reservations; which was referred to the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FORFEITURE OF LAND GRANT IN IOWA.

Mr. VAN EATON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to inquire whether it would be in order to call up that bill for consideration now.

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. STRUBLE. Under the rules, when may it be called up?

The SPEAKER. An order of the House made during the present session gives the Committee on Public Lands the right to call up at any time when the House is not otherwise engaged bills forfeiting land grants to railroad companies and certain other classes of bills mentioned in the order. But the House is now engaged in receiving reports from committees under the rule.

DENISON AND WASHITA VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1486) to authorize the Denison and Washita Valley Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PERRY, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 8288) to reapportion the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM J. SMITH.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (S. 13) for the relief of William J. Smith, late surveyor of customs of the port of Memphis, State of Tennessee; which was referred to the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF ISAAC P. TICE.

OFFICE OF SECOND VICE-PRESIDENT UNITED STATES.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Elections, reported back with amendments the joint resolution (H. Res. 61) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States creating and defining the office of second vice-president of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BEACH, from the same committee, by unanimous consent, submitted minority views; which were ordered to be printed, to accompany the report of the committee.

Mr. CALDWELL. I desire to submit hereafter other views of a minority to accompany this report.

There was no objection, and leave was granted to the minority to file views hereafter.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 5319) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for losses by fire, burglary, and other unavoidable casualties; which was ordered to be laid on the table, and the accompanying report printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider general appropriation bills.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, this day was set apart for the Committee on Military Affairs, and I would like to have an understanding that we shall have another day in lieu of this, which will be occupied by the Post-Office Committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs (H. R. 7634) was set for consideration on this day. The gentleman from Indiana asks that that order be continued until the committee has had one day for the consideration of this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT was then agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, having discussed the question under consideration at length upon a previous occasion, I desire to occupy the attention of the House for a very few moments only, after which I will yield what remains of my time to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS].

The precise question before this committee and which we are called upon to pass is whether we shall appropriate the sum of $375,000 for the transportation of our foreign mails, or whether we shall appropriate the sum of $800,000, as provided by the amendment of the Senate. Sir, I am not surprised at the action taken by the Senate. The sum of $375,000, as set forth in the original bill and as presented by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, is not sufficient even to pay sea and inland postage. To substantiate the statement I make I call the attention of the committee to the report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails. He says:

If it is the will of Congress that the entire sea and inland postage shall be given to vessels of the United States register for the conveyance of mails transported by them, the estimate of $350,000 must be increased $75,000.

This House, upon a former occasion when this matter was here for consideration, sought to put upon the bill the sum of $75,000, but we were unable to do even that. The matter goes to the Senate, and that body, without distinction of party, proposes, to appropriate not $375,000, but $800,000.

Sir, I have no fear of the cry of "subsidy" so far as I am concerned. It has no terrors for me. I do not know any one of the companies engaged in the transportation of our foreign mails. I have no interest in these companies; I have the same interest that every other citizen of this great Republic, no more and no less. Now what is this proposition that comes before us from the Senate? First, it is that the foreign mails shall be carried by American steamships. Is there a member on the floor of this House who objects to that? Is there any subsidy in that? The original bill does not declare that our mails shall be carried by American vessels or steamships. It appropriates simply the sum of $375,000, leaving it in the discretion of the Postmaster-General how that money shall be expended.

We come to the second proposition: That not only that $375,000, but there shall be given a sum of $800,000. Notwithstanding we are the largest agricultural manufacturing country in the world and ought to export more than any other nation, we are the only nation on the face of the earth that compels vessels to carry the mails for sea and inland postage. England gives annually $3,000,000; Germany gives $1,600,000; France gives $3,600,000. We gave last year the sum of $331,000, $271,000 of which, as stated by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], was paid to foreign steamships.

Mr. Chairman, a few days ago we voted fifteen and a quarter millions for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country; $4,000,000 of that appropriation went for the purpose of improving the Mississippi River. I ask you what justice or propriety is there in this House giving $4,000,000 to the Mississippi River and refusing the sum of $800,000 to establish lines between the United States and the South American Republics?

Upon what theory can we appropriate millions for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and then close its mouth against the ports of South America?

In my judgment, sir, this $800,000, if voted as prescribed by this amendment, will bring greater advantages and benefit to this country than the entire fifteen and one-fourth millions contained in the river and harbor bill.

The great question that confronts us to-day as a nation and as a people—and a question that we have got to meet sooner or later—is how we are to find a market for our surplus products. Just south and east of us are Venezuela and Brazil; beyond is the Empire of Japan; Venezuela with a population of 3,000,000, Brazil with a population of 10,000,000, Japan with a population of 40,000,000. They are without manufactures. They have to go abroad for their manufactured products. The answer to this question is in the passage of the Senate amendment. Let us establish our commercial relations with these countries. We are entitled to their trade, and we will have it if we will take the necessary steps.

In the South American republics we shall find a market for all our surplus products.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I intended. I simply want to reiterate what I said on a former occasion. I have given this matter a great deal of thought without the slightest interest in the question save that of any citizen of the country. I say, rather than permit foreign vessels to transport our mails, rather than permit foreign countries, England, Germany, and France to monopolize the trade of Brazil, of Venezuela, of Japan, ay, and of China, I would build the vessels at Government expense, would equip them with American seamen, and establish commercial relations with every South American Republic. If $800,000 are not sufficient I would make it eight times this amount. [Applause.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PHELPS. This amendment, and especially the action of the Senate when they passed it, is full of encouragement to the friends of American shipping. Thirty-nine Senators voted for the measure; only eighteen voted against it. In the discussion and in the division there was no effort to make it a party question. Each Senator spoke and each Senator voted according to his view of the merits of the question, and on the final passage eight Democratic Senators——

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is not in order to comment on the opinions or action of Senators.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. PHELPS. I am not making a comment upon the opinions of Senators beyond stating the facts which are given to the world by the press and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I think the gentleman from Georgia should be proud that eight Democratic Senators had the courage——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend his remarks till the point of order is determined.

Mr. PHELPS. I trust that the objection of the gentleman from Georgia to hearing the truth about the action of his colleagues in the Senate will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from New Jersey is dealing unfairly in continuing his remarks.

Mr. PHELPS. Why could not the matter of order be settled if I simply say I read in the public prints that eight Democratic Senators voted to give free ships to American commerce?

Mr. BLOUNT. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from Georgia to cite the rule under which he makes the point of order.

Mr. PHELPS. If this is exhausting my time I would rather print the extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which gave the vote and pass on.

Mr. BURROWS. I presume while the point of order is being considered that will not be deducted from the gentleman's time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take care of that.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. Is it in order to delay the business of the House while the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is studying the rules?

The CHAIRMAN. The business of the House is not being delayed. The rule is being sought at the request of the Chair.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will ask the Clerk to read from page 132 of Jefferson's Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there, because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the gentleman from New Jersey that he thought the point of order was well taken, but would be willing to hear from the gentleman after the reading of the rule.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, then, with the view of saving time, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, the gentleman from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. PHELPS. I thank the gentleman for waiving his point of order and will trespass no further than to say that I read in the public press and the RECORD of Congress that eight Democratic Senators had the courage to vote to give new ships to American commerce and new markets to American manufactures. And now, the Senate having done its duty, it is time for this House to do theirs. The measure has so many advantages, it supplies so many wants, we ought promptly to adopt it. We want steamships; this measure will give them. We want markets for our surplus; this measure will give them. We want to defend our coasts; this measure will give us a merchant marine, the militia of the sea—the most efficient means of doing it.

Such a measure, so useful, so reasonable, we shall refuse to pass, if we do reject it, because its enemies call it a subsidy. It is not a subsidy, for it is neither a gift nor an excessive payment. What is it? It is a fair payment to American ships for carrying the mails, and if you ask me how I ascertain that the payment is a fair one, I answer, as I ascertain the fair price for any commodity or any service. I go out into the markets and I ask the price, and in this case I go out into the market of the world and learn that this price which we propose to pay for carrying our mail is less than the price paid by any other nation. No one has yet challenged the proposition, except in the case of Germany. Let us pause, then, for a moment to look at the history of Germany in this relation. Germany did not encourage her shipping by liberal payment or gift, and because she did not the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in great enthusiasm exclaimed, "How business-like! How worthy the great statesman at the head of the German Empire!"

But what was the result of all this business and all this statesmanship? Germany secured only two steamship lines worthy of mention. They run between Hamburg and Bremen and New York, between old and wealthy ports. These have done a good business and increased their ships, but only because they had the business of carrying emigrants, which is always lucrative. A line to Australia tried to live; but its service was so wandering and dilatory, it was such a fleet of tramps, that the Germans sent their mails and their freight in British bottoms; and look at the result! The old principle operated; business followed the flag, and the Germans found that London bankers got all of the exchanges and London merchants were beginning to get all of the business. So Germany acted the part of wisdom. These facts were stated in a memorial, which was the foundation of new legislation in the Reichstag, and upon their presentation the German Parliament acted—reversed its policy, and started courageously upon the path long trod by its successful neighbors. It agreed to give $1,000,000 to a single line for carrying the German mail one year to Australia. One million dollars to a single line! The gentleman from Georgia praised the old policy of Germany, which Germany publicly declared was a failure. Why does he refuse to praise the new policy of Germany? Must we take the words from his mouth, and, in view of $1,000,000 voted directly to the North German Lloyds, exclaim for him, "How business-like! How worthy the great statesman at the head of the German Empire!" [Laughter.]

But we think this an excessive payment. We have more moderate notions. Our Pacific Mail Company has for years been performing this same service upon almost the same terms. She has carried our mails to Australia promptly, safely, and frequently. But we did not give her $1,000,000; we gave her $20,000; and for this paltry sum she carried them during the year 1884 750,000 miles.

This is the service rendered to the mail service of this country; and this is all for many a year we have paid her for it. And yet the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] has spoken of this company as an enemy to the country. Yes, an enemy, if to multiply our trade many times and to get no pay for doing so is worthy of censure. Yes, if to multiply our trade with Australia three times, our trade with Mexico four times, and our trade with Central America fifteen times, and to do it for nothing, is the act of a public enemy, but not otherwise. Yet this is what the Pacific Mail has done for us in the last ten or fifteen years.

This is the payment that Germany makes nowadays for carrying her mails. I will take one example from the policy of France, and choose one that is near by and familiar, because it is easier to understand and to remember.

For many years France has had a steamship line plying between Havre and New York. It was old and faithful, but not excellent. France sought to improve it. She offered an inducement, and as a result five new steamers of magnificent proportions are entering the line. And what is the inducement? France gives each steamer that makes the round trip $14,500. The round trip is 6,000 miles; so if we pay the highest rate warranted by this amendment the United States will pay to the American steamer that renders this service $3,000. France pays $14,500 for what we are to pay—if our opponents will let us give this "subsidy"—$3,000. And Germany now pays $1,000,000 for what the United States has been paying $20,000.

I will not seek other examples, but will repeat my original declaration without fear of contradiction, that no nation pays so little for similar services as we propose to do even under this amendment. And I also repeat, in view of that truth, that this amendment proposes only a fair payment to American ships for carrying the American mails.

Now, let us consider what we get besides if we make this fair payment. We get two things that we want very much—steamships and trade. And if you ask me again how do I know this, my answer is: First, because there are capitalists versed in nautical business who have again and again declared their readiness to establish new lines between all the old ports and to any of the new if the vote of this amendment can be assured for years; but, secondly, because this has been the policy of all European nations and has always had the same results. This nation wanted ships and wanted trade. They paid their money after this fashion we are speaking of and they got ships and trade, and almost in the ratio in which they paid their money. England paid the most, so England got the largest returns.

Since 1840 England has paid $250,000,000 in such subsidies. A monstrous sum, and yet there was thrift in it. She paid $250,000,000, but she has to-day 55 per cent. of the foreign tonnage of the world and 44 per cent. of all its tonnage. Englishmen can proudly look over the world and see these results, and if there were time for details how many separate proofs of the wisdom of this policy might be cited like this. The United States now sends across the seas 25,000,000 tons annually. Statisticians say it is fair to assume that each ton costs $6. If that is so, this country alone pays to Great Britian $150,000,000 for freight each year. But this only shows the liberality with which England spends money to encourage the mercantile marine. I want to show further, by a little incident, the courage and energy with which, under all circumstances, she pursues this policy. France got her steamship line into Brazil first—Brazil for whose trade civilization competes and whose trade ought to be ours. This French line carried English mails and freight with safety and dispatch. It was practically direct connection for England, as the French vessels stopped at Southampton.

But this did not satisfy England. She had learned the lesson too well that trade follows the flag, and she determined to send her own flag to Brazil, so she made this extraordinary offer, to guarantee 8 per cent. on all the capital which should be invested in a new English line, and this was in effect the form of her guarantee: If the profits made by this company shall not equal 8 per cent. on the capital invested, then the government will make up the deficiency. Was it a bad investment? Look at the trade of Brazil to-day. France and England to-day buy from Brazil about as much of its productions as we. These two nations buy between fifty and sixty millions of Brazilian products, and so does the United States. But when we look for the reciprocity how different the picture. Brazil buys of the United States nine millions; Brazil buys of France and England forty-nine millions of merchandise. And yet, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] showed, the bulk of the merchandise which Brazil buys consists of just those articles which are American specialties, and which our countrymen can produce better and cheaper than any competitors. The articles consist largely of cotton goods, machinery, agricultural implements. But France and England are willing to pay for it and own their transportation. We have no direct communication, and that disadvantage more than balances the natural advantages which we possess.

I have no time to speak of our long coast, which no navy can protect, and which must be left to the care of our mercantile marine.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey has already exceeded his time by two minutes. But the Chair will recognize him in his own right of——

Mr. BINGHAM. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. PHELPS. Five minutes are enough.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield eight minutes of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I shall not abuse my friend's courtesy, and I will sum up the rest of the points I wanted to make.

There are several questions the friends of this measure ask and never get an answer. Let me repeat them. Why do the opponents of the measure do so much and pay so much for our domestic mails and do so little and pay so little for our foreign mails? What is the difference? Why have they given so much to railways—too much—in money, $100,000,000; in land, 200,000,000 acres? And why do they refuse to give anything to steamships? What is the difference? And why do they encourage us to pay for carrying our mails on the land and along the coast more than the service returns, and exhibit horror when we suggest that they expend in the development of our foreign commerce scarcely half the money which our foreign mails have paid into the Treasury? We ask you to give $800,000 to encourage this great interest and you refuse, although you collect over $1,600,000 in ocean postage. Shall we encourage home trade and frown upon foreign commerce?

Mr. Speaker, I want again to refer to the action of the Senate, not to abuse the courtesy of the gentleman from Georgia, who waived the point of order, but to recall a remark which the RECORD officially recorded and the newspapers reported. A Senator had the courage to state the whole truth in this matter. He said his only regret in voting for this amendment was that the amount appropriated was too small. That Senator was the Senator from Georgia; and I say now, not in taunt of the gentleman from Georgia, whose sincerity I greatly honor, but in kindness for him—if what we hear of his great State is true; if it is growing in wealth, population, intelligence, and energy, the sentiments of her Senator are likely to be sentiments which his own people will approve and reward. [Applause.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that in consequence of indisposition I shall not be able to participate in the debate at this time as fully as I had intended. I shall, therefore, yield so much time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] as he may desire to occupy.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I practically agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin that this is no subsidy that we propose to pay for our foreign-mail service; but, sir, I do not wish to have it understood that I would be unwilling to vote a liberal subsidy if satisfied that the effect of it would be to extend American commerce and to build up foreign markets for the products of our farms and our factories.

However, the word "subsidy" is invoked in this discussion because, I suppose, it is imagined that it may have the effect to frighten some man from his conviction and change his vote. I suppose it is true that wherever wealth is aggregated in large, in vast enterprises, in railroads or steamship lines, you will have rich men, capitalists, in their management who will be grasping in their disposition and in their practices, and because there may be, or it is fancied there are, such men as that in the United States connected with certain steamship lines, their names are bandied about here on the floor of the House for the purpose of exciting prejudice against the Senate amendment that proposes to increase above the present law the compensation to be paid to American ships for ocean mail service. I suppose, sir, that the aggregation of capital has had the same effect upon the other side of the ocean that it has had upon this side of the ocean; and if necessary for the development of our industries I will quite as soon, yes, sooner, vote money to our own ocean lines to open up a foreign market for the fruits of our farms and factories, for the extension of American commerce, for carrying the American mail, as to adopt a policy that will enable the monopolists that control the foreign steamships to destroy our markets, cripple our industries, ruin our commerce and drive it from the ocean. And when gentlemen clamor that the lobby is filled with men who are pushing the Senate amendments, I may as well retort that as strong, far stronger, influences are at work, emanating from other quarters, to strike down our American steamship lines; and to use names, I would as soon vote for an American Jay Gould, an American Huntington, and an American Sage on this side of the Atlantic, if it will result in extending our trade, our markets, our commerce, as to vote for the English Jay Gould, the English Huntington, the English Sage, the German Jay Gould, the German Huntington, the German Sage, when a ruined trade, market, and commerce are to follow. [Applause.] I have no doubt that the same processes that are practiced here are indulged in over there on similar questions; but I make no insinuation that the foreign influences are at work here. I have not felt any lobby influences, home or foreign, in regard to this question. Those who speak of such influences as being at work doubtless speak from their own knowledge or else from their imaginations, in neither case, from my standpoint, to their credit. I believe that this question ought to be and that it will be decided, if not upon its merits and outside of any influences of doubtful character, at least according to the honest convictions of a majority of the House.

But, sir, the only argument that is used against the Senate amendment, the only argument that has any force in it as against that amendment is suggested by the question, "How can we expect to build up this trade in the South American and Central American states and in Mexico if we need a high protective tariff to hold our home markets for our home products?" That question has been put to me to-day, and I have been asked to explain it. It is very easy of solution.

He who has watched the progress of our manufacturing industries for the last twenty years knows this to be a fact: that in nearly all that they consume in South America, in the Central American states, and in Mexico, and which is produced in this country and in Europe, we to-day need no protective tariff to protect our home markets against the foreign producer. In all the cheaper fabrics, and they are the only ones for which they afford a market, we can and do compete with the world. As to all fabrics, iron, steel, wood, and leather goods, largely made by machinery, and in which manual labor is comparatively a small element, we need no protection whatever. We can make and sell them on equal terms with the rest of the world. This is so true in the iron and steel industries, that I believe the exportation of iron and steel goods to those and other foreign markets within the last year amounted to over $16,000,000; and yet we can not compete with England in all the steel goods; but in machinery, in agricultural implements—the hoe, the ax, the shovel, the augur, the bit, nails, wire, and mowers, reapers, plows—in all an agricultural people consume we can and do.

These are goods that Mexico and Central and South America demand and will buy from us and are buying from us to a certain extent to-day, and will continue to buy if we can ship them there. This is true also as to cotton fabrics. All the cheaper grades of cotton goods we can produce in this country and compete successfully with the manufacturers of the world. To-day—I will not limit, however, quite so closely—I have been told within the year our producers of the cheaper coarser cotton fabrics have been able to produce and export and sell in the English colonies their goods in competition with the English manufactured goods, because they were enabled to produce them cheaper by the aid of labor-saving machinery. And this is proved by the fact our yearly exports of them amount to $12,000,000 of many products of leather, all this is equally true. Of leather goods we export to a foreign market about $10,000,000 in value; and you may go through with lines of goods those people buy and consume and you will establish the fact that by the development of our manufacturing industries, by the use of machinery, we are able to make and sell to them as cheap as any one else those goods of which they consume considerable quantities and which make up their foreign commerce, but which they now the more largely buy in Europe, and we are unable to compete with Germany, with England, and with France only when they monopolize, control the transportation, the carrying trade. I am asked to explain why we can do this and yet pay more for our labor. I answer, because our manufacture of the goods I have mentioned is largely done by machinery; in the use of machinery but little manual labor is required to make them.

These goods, to which I have referred, I repeat, are largely the product of machinery and the mechanical ingenuity of America, and consequently manual labor enters but little into their cost. Of course when you reach the higher grade of goods, where there is a larger expenditure of skilled human labor, it is impossible to compete with the lower-priced labor of Europe. Our laborers are paid the better wages.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And if we enlarge the market and increase the demand can we still manufacture the article cheaper and pay the same or higher rates for labor?

Mr. HISCOCK. If we enlarge the market we enlarge the production and the cost is reduced necessarily. It is true in this country by the aggregation of capital in all industries production has been increased, and I want to add in this connection that while production has been increased the rate of wages has not only kept its place but has been increased also.

It has not had the effect to depress labor; but, sir, as bearing upon this question, we have to-day a trade of some $40,000,000 with South America, and it is all in those lines of goods in which it has been demonstrated by actual experience that we can compete with European producers. And yet Europe has, I suppose, about two-thirds the South American trade for the reason, and it is the only reason, because we have not American transportation to their markets. I assert we can drive European producers from those markets at no great cost if you will give our people the same facilities for transportation. As illustrating this, I have before me tables of the trade of the United States and other nations with Venezuela, to which the "Red D" line runs. In that country we to-day sell $14,831,221 worth of goods as against $11,902,322 worth sold by England; still less were sold there by Germany and France. Wherever we have opened up communication with a South American or a Central American state, buying largely from them, as we do, the result has been in every instance to increase the sale of our own products of American goods there.

Year by year the statistics prove that the trade has been increasing, and due to the fact I have already mentioned, that in the lines of goods which they purchase and consume we to-day can produce as cheap or cheaper than Europe. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say there is nothing in the argument that the protective policy is inconsistent with the development of our foreign trade, or that gentlemen who vote for this measure will take positions antagonistic to the protective policy. Sir, there is no question of free trade, revenue reform, or protection involved here at all. Gentlemen on the other side may attempt to whip men into line upon the pretense that this is a question of revenue reform or of free trade, or on this side upon the ground that it is a question of protection; but there is nothing in such pretenses. I expect to see gentlemen who understand this question quite as well as I do, and who differ with me upon the whole theory of protection and revenue, voting in the line of this Senate amendment.

Another suggestion in regard to our South American trade. By examination hastily I find in 1884 we marketed there $7,000,000 of our agricultural products—flour, bacon, lard, butter, hams, cheese. I further find South America is a large purchaser of these products, and right in juxtaposition with this I place another fact: They import into Brazil $5,000,000 worth of butter and cheese. England does not produce the butter and cheese she consumes, and the butter and cheese from the United States is shipped to England or Holland and then to Brazil and sold at 75 cents per pound, and sold as English or Dutch butter.

This is in the markets to which we do not have American lines; the shipment by way of Europe is what makes the high price.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another aspect of this case to which I desire to call attention, and which bears directly upon the question whether this a subsidy or not. A subsidy to be offensive to me must be the giving of something for which we are to receive no return. It can only be offensive upon the theory that it is a donation, for which no value is to be returned by the donee. Let us look at this question for a moment in that light. I ask the attention of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, who has charge of this measure in this House, to what I am going to say, so that he or some other gentleman may have an opportunity to challenge my statement. I assert that the effect of the American lines upon our commerce with South America within the last five years has been to lessen the price of the goods that we buy from South America a million and a half of dollars in the last year. Take coffee alone. The effect of the Brazilian line upon the price of that luxury or necessity, whichever you please to call it, due to cheapened transportation alone, has been to reduce it about $1,000,000 to the American consumer.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly I will.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the proportion of coffee brought by the Brazilian line to this country?

Mr. HISCOCK. I can not give the exact amount, but the whole consumption of coffee in this country amounts, I believe, to about forty millions a year.

Mr. BLOUNT. And the Brazilian line declines to carry it, and it is carried on foreign vessels.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the effect of the Brazilian line upon the importation of coffee alone has been to reduce the freight, and so to reduce the cost to the consumer in about the amount I have stated.

Mr. BLOUNT. And I remind the gentleman that the Brazilian line does not bring coffee at all.

Mr. HISCOCK. In 1884 the Brazilian line brought here 199,284 bags, and the proportion to the whole amount taken to New York was 15½ per cent; but I do not care whether the Brazilian line brings it or not. The Brazilian line holds the trade upon it down to a certain point, and if England, Germany, or any other country underbids them so that they are unwilling to bring it, and it is brought by a cheaper line, is not the effect the same? Is not my argument equally good under that condition of facts? It makes no difference whether the coffee comes here in American bottoms or comes in foreign vessels. I say that the effect of American competition has been to lower the freight and so to lower the price of that commodity to the consumer for the past year $1,000,000 in our markets. The lowering of price, which is due to the reduction in freights upon our entire traffic, alone has benefited the consumer to the extent of one million and a half of dollars. The effect of the competition of American lines in South American trade has been within those figures——

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman state how long the Brazilian line has been running?

Mr. HISCOCK. It has been running I think since 1883; the Red line, to which is due to some extent the reduction of which I have spoken, longer. The other line began in 1882, perhaps earlier. In that short period of time, Mr. Chairman, this wonderful result has been produced in lowering the price of that commodity in this country.

I will read a dispatch just handed me:

> In '77, no steamers; in '78, tramp once in three months. Old American line began May, '78; stopped May, '81. Occasional chartered tramps up to starting of our line, January, '83.
> LACHLAN, JR.

I am within bounds when I state that the reduction in freights alone resulting from the competition of these American steamship lines has benefited the American consumer at the rate of a million and a half dollars each year.

Mr. Chairman, I have said thus much as bearing upon the question whether American steamship lines to South America, to Central America, and to Mexico are a possibility, whether trade with the people of those countries is a possibility. It seems to me that this is demonstrated by the large volume of business to which I have alluded, and by the fact that in those ports which have had easy communication with the United States we have driven the foreign producer from the market. It is a fixed fact which must be conceded by every one that it is in the power of the people of the United States to grasp the trade of these nations. This has been further illustrated by gentlemen who have preceded me, and I shall not discuss that point further.

What is it we propose to do? Do we propose to give American steamship lines a subsidy? No; but taking into view the rates paid by other nations for this class of service, we propose to pay to American steamships, vessels of American registry, only a meager compensation at best for carrying American mails.

Right here I wish to say that never in the history of this country have we sought to make our mail service self-sustaining. Talk about subsidy! Why, we have been continuously since the beginning of this Government paying subsidies for carrying domestic mails. I do not know of a single steamboat line which in the whole history of our country has been paid for the transportation of mails at the rate of the postage upon the mail matter carried. I ask gentlemen on the other side of this question to point me to one such case. Year after year, Congress after Congress has provided for the carrying of mails upon steamboat lines for no other purpose than to build up those lines. That has been the policy of the country.

In the star service we have year after year let contracts for the carrying of mails into the South and into the far West for no other object in the world, as it seems to me, than to build up stage routes through those localities for the purpose of helping the frontiersman, for the purpose of building up the country, for the purpose of giving to the American citizen, wherever he may be located, mail facilities. The star-route service has never repaid to the Government the expense; the steamboat-mail service has never done so; but contracts have been made time and again in those services for the purpose of subsidizing steamboat lines and stage routes.

But here, the American people, with a trade of over $200,000,000 in their hands to-day, ask to have their mails transported for them in American vessels by the United States Government, and they are told that it shall not be transported for them in American vessels, but shall be transported in foreign vessels, with the direct effect of crushing out the enterprises in which they are engaged.

Let us examine a moment to ascertain what will be paid under this Senate amendment, if adopted, as compared with sums which are paid for similar service by England, Germany, and France.

Take the Peninsular and Oriental Company, engaged in the trade with Japan and China. That line includes 664,874 miles of travel per year; and the gross amount paid by England is $2,250,000, being at the rate of $3.38 per mile. The same rate, if paid to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, would yield $517,140. Under this amendment of the Senate, which they tell us subsidizes the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, that company will receive $76,800 as against $2,250,000 paid for similar service to rival lines.

Take the Peninsular and Oriental Company's line to Australia and the Straits colonies, running annually 145,600 miles. That company receives the gross sum of $650,000, being at the rate of $4.18 a mile. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, if paid at the same rate, would receive $642,048, but under the Senate amendment will receive $112,500.

Take the Royal Mail, running to Central America and the east coast of South America. For 480,960 miles annually traveled that line receives $495,000, being at the rate of $1.03 a mile. The same rate paid to the American line which would compete with this foreign line would yield $135,960; yet under this bill that American line would receive only $66,000.

Take the Brazil and the River Plate line, running 182,200 miles annually at the rate of 70 cents a mile and receiving $126,280. The same rate paid to American ships would give them $92,400; but under this Senate amendment they would receive but $66,000.

I will not weary the committee by dwelling further upon these figures, which I publish with my remarks.

The result as shown by these statistics is that England, France, and Germany pay for their mail service from 50 per cent. over to 200 per cent. more than is paid by the United States. And do we say that they are subsidizing their lines? Where England has English commerce, Germany German commerce, or France French commerce, in which their citizens respectively are engaged, they say to them, "We will carry your mail to you if your necessities require it or your interests thereby will be advanced." In reference to her mail service, as in other matters, England says to her citizen, "Wherever the English citizen is the English arm is strong enough, and will continue to be strong enough, to protect him and subserve his interests.

Mr. Chairman, I would not stand here to advocate the carrying of American mails in American ships at a larger rate of compensation than other nations pay for the transportation of their mails; but I ask to find out what the service is worth and pay it. How are you to judge of its value?

Is that value to be determined by the policy which seems to be favored by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], and I regret to say is favored by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER], that these foreign ships, paid these large sums of money for carrying the mails of their respective nations, shall have our mails to carry to those nations with which we have a commerce and which is in direct competition with the carrying nations of Europe; that we will give our mails to them to carry at the low price at which they can afford to do it for the sake of crushing out American competition?

What is the effect? As has been stated here on the floor, we have paid $240,000 to foreign vessels against $40,000 to American vessels.

Why, sir, it is for the interest of the ship-owners on the other side to carry our mails for nothing if by that method they can drive American steamships off the ocean. Shall we be parties to that?

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Will my colleague permit me to ask a question for information?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Why is it they appropriate $800,000 for this year, when the appropriation last year, so far as my memory serves me, was for $400,000?

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, sir, I do not know why. If I should give a reason—and perhaps that would be the true reason—it is that those who favor this policy——

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I voted for it last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. Those who favor the policy supposed $400,000 was all that Congress would appropriate, and therefore that sum was adopted. It was not because it was the limit which could be expended to advantage, but because it was the largest sum Congress could be prevailed upon to appropriate.

I desire to be understood upon this question, because it was doubted for a moment by a gentleman who investigated this question. More money might well be appropriated to carry American mails and extend our commerce with the South American, Central American, and Mexican States.

As I was remarking, the policy which obtains favor on the other side, and which obtains favor from gentlemen on this side who seem to be alarmed lest some advantage might be secured by some steamship line with which some rich man is connected—the policy they favor is this: That these English, French, and German lines paid the large compensations I have named—but I do not know that they are large—but paid these rates of 50, 100, and 200 and more per cent., more than we propose to pay, that we will let them carry our mails at the lowest possible price, the direct effect of it being to drive American ships from the ocean!

As I said, Mr. Chairman, England can afford to carry our mails for nothing. As I have pointed out, we are competing with her for trade, and she feels it. She can afford to carry our mails for nothing, if the direct effect of it would be the destruction of these American lines of steamships.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] said wisely when he said this was no subsidy. It is none, measured by the price we pay for carrying our domestic mails on our railroads, on our steamboats, on our stages, upon our horses. Measured by the rates paid by European powers we propose a small compensation indeed.

I apprehend if any board sat upon this question to determine what it was fairly worth, there is not either in this country, England, Germany, or France one which would not report larger compensation was due for value received than that proposed in the Senate amendment.

I have but little more to say in this discussion. Those who have preceded me have already commented in detail upon the trade which it is within our power to grasp. The effect of our taking possession of it will be to revive the industries of this nation substantially. All that will enter into that commerce we can produce. The building up of our shipping interests is involved in it. American labor is involved in it. In it we find a new investment for American capital. It is about the only thing that is necessary or that is in the power of the United States to grasp. She has grown rich through her industries and through their development. She has reached the point where she produces more than she can consume—where she can produce as cheap as the old country the goods South America and Central America consume. It has been said by some gentlemen here that we on this side of the House could ill afford to support a measure of this kind.

I desire to say in response to that, that if there is a governmental policy that is worthy of support it is this; that if there is one governmental policy more than another that will add to our prosperity on which we can enter it is this. There is no donation in it to any person or corporation anywhere. It is simply proposed to pay for service rendered to us what it is worth, but it carries with it the extension of American trade. It carries with it the extension of American markets. It carries with it the saving to this country in the way of exchange yearly of over $40,000,000 of gold which now we pay out in exchange to the Central and South American states. The balance of trade is against us there. If we enter upon this policy it will be changed. Year by year we see signs of that change. There is not a single port into which an American steamship runs that our trade is not increased, and gradually the balance is being changed in our favor.

As I said, over $40,000,000 of gold each year go from our coffers, go from our banks, to pay these nations the balance of trade that is due them. And I for one, as a party man, and as a citizen of the United States, find nothing in this Senate amendment which I can not support.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PETERS. I propose to occupy a few moments.

There are one or two observations which I desire to make, Mr. Chairman, in relation to the measure which is now under consideration. In the Forty-eighth Congress I voted against a provision similar to this. I was induced to do so because it was charged at that time on both sides of the House that it was a subsidy to a great steamboat monopoly; that we were asked to subsidize the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; and that this company would receive whatever appropriation might be made for this purpose. Without examining into the far-reaching consequences of my action I voted against a similar proposition in principle which was before the House in the last Congress. Since that time I have given this subject some consideration. I have been so strongly prejudiced in my feeling against anything like a subsidy that it was with difficulty I brought myself to view this question in anything like a fair light.

I rested content with the vote that I gave in the last Congress until a thorough examination convinced me that the cry of subsidy was unjust and benefited English monopolies and injured American industries. Believing this, my vote shall be cast in favor of the Senate amendment. I would like to know what the outlook is if we are to continue on in the same course as in the past year. I would like to know what there is in the future to which an American can look forward with pride in connection with this subject. Can you look forward to 1887 to 1888 or to 1889 in the hope that this country will have any better business relations with the South American states? Can you look forward to any better time in the future so long as we continue to be whipped into this do-nothing policy by this cry of subsidy?

I have the honor to represent in this House one of the largest agricultural districts in the United States. It is exclusively agricultural, and it has a population at present which is greater than that of any other district in the United States except those States that compose one Congressional district. And I say that it is to the interest of the farmers in my district to indorse and uphold the very policy that is inaugurated by this Senate amendment. And why? Because the farmer of my district is interested in increasing the consuming power of the United States. The producing power of the United States in grain today is greater than the consuming power, and hence the wheat producer is placed at the mercy of the Liverpool wheat merchant. And what we desire, what the producing classes, especially the agricultural producing classes to-day desire, is that the consuming power of the United States shall be increased so that we within our own border can consume every bushel of wheat produced in the United States. And whenever we increase our consuming power so that we will be able to consume every bushel of wheat produced in the United States then we will free that product from the control of the Liverpool wheat merchant and the Liverpool wheat market. What the farmer of Kansas and the farmer of the Mississippi Valley need is an increase in the manufacturing industries of the United States, because every man who is a manufacturer, every man who is a laborer in the manufacturing establishment, is a consumer and not a producer of farm products.

What we desire is to take from the farming classes of to-day and add to the manufacturing classes, so that the consuming power of this country may be increased. I say that the farmer of Kansas, notwithstanding what has been said upon this floor, has a greater interest in this proposition than has the manufacturer of the East—a greater interest even than has the stockholder in any of these steamship lines. If encouraging trade with South America gives, as it will, an additional market for our manufactured products, American labor is thereby benefited, our consuming power is inereased, and agricultural products will find a remunerative home market.

If I could look forward into the future and see that the time would come when we would be relieved from the power of this monopoly that is now clutching American industry; if I could look forward into the future and see that, without some experimentation on our part, we might expect or hope to be in a better position in the future, then I would be willing to stand still. But no man can point out to me any prospect that, without action in the present, we shall be any better off in the future than we are now.

But, Mr. Chairman, aside from this is another great consideration. The American continent is the field that properly belongs to the United States. I am a believer in the Monroe doctrine that gives to the United States the American continent. I believe the time will come when Canada and Mexico will come under the American flag, and I believe that by the kind of legislation proposed in this Senate amendment the time will be hastened when we, instead of Great Britain, shall have control of the South American trade. When I examine the figures in relation to trade with the South American countries I find that the United States, which should have it all, have but a small proportion of it.

The United States with her thousands of miles of seacoast, the United States with her immense advantages over other countries, the United States with everything in her favor, should have every particle of that South American trade, yet to-day she has only $75,000,000 of it, while foreign countries have $325,000,000. Is there any man who has pride in the American flag or pride in his country who is willing to submit to this without an effort to change it—who is willing that foreign nations should have $325,000,000 of that South American trade while we have only $75,000,000? That is the situation of to-day. I repeat that if any gentleman can show me that, without some such action or legislation as this, that balance of trade will be changed in our favor, I shall be glad to have him do it, because I would like to vote against this appropriation if I could do it consistently with my ideas of what is due to the honor of my country. I know it is said that this is a subsidy; I know it is said and has been argued here that the voting of this money is robbing the tax-payers of the country.

Mr. Chairman, how utterly fallacious is any statement of that kind! Our foreign-mail service pays over a million dollars more than we pay now or have ever paid for it. As matter of fact, the United States never does invest $1 in paying for our foreign-mail service. It is the foreign merchants and the home merchants corresponding with each other. It is the inhabitant of the United States writing to his correspondents abroad and paying the sea postage—these are the parties who voluntarily contribute the money from which we propose to pay these steamship lines for carrying our foreign mails. The people of the United States do not pay a cent of it by tax. It is the voluntary contribution of the business men and others who patronize the foreign-mail service. It is out of that voluntary contribution that it is now proposed to take $800,000 and appropriate it in the interest of our foreign-mail service.

I cast aside, therefore, this talk about taxing the people of this country, directly or indirectly, for the money with which to subsidize (as some gentlemen put it) these American steamships for carrying our foreign mails. There is nothing to it.

Mr. Chairman, what a spectacle! The United States, the wealthiest nation under the sun, with $10,000,000,000 more of aggregate wealth than England and all her possessions, the wealthiest nation in agriculture, the wealthiest in manufactures, yet bowing down and crouching in the dust of humiliation before British power and British influence; yielding without a struggle $325,000,000 of the trade of the South American states which properly and naturally belongs to us! For one, I will not assent to such a surrender. I want to encourage our American steamship lines. I want to say to these men—I care not who they are, I care not how much they may come here and ask Congress to assist them—I want to say to them that we will take $800,000 from the $2,100,000 of revenue derived from the foreign-mail service and appropriate it to pay, under the discretion of the Postmaster-General, a reasonable compensation for carrying our foreign mails, with the hope that it may open up to us new fields for the sale of our manufactured goods; with the hope that it may increase the consuming power of our people; with the hope that it may restore our mercantile marine, so that the flag of our country may again float over as many merchant vessels as it did before the war.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. If no gentleman desires to occupy the floor the Chair will put the question.

Several MEMBERS. "Vote!" "Vote!"

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that some gentleman upon the other side will go on with the debate. We want to make an equal division of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there have been three hours occupied on either side, and that there remains one hour and twenty-two minutes on each side, provided the debate continues until 5 o'clock.

Mr. DOCKERY rose and was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia in charge of this bill [Mr. BLOUNT] desire to retain the last hour?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not object to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr.

DOCKERY] going on for his hour. The residue of the time I shall claim.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, having discussed at considerable length the propositions involved in what is known as the "subsidy clause" of the Post-Office bill for the present fiscal year, and inasmuch as the pending Senate amendment involves the same principles of public policy, I will content myself by offering a few additional reasons why this measure should not prevail.

The amendment, which is No. 6 in the bill now under discussion, is in the following terms:

(6) For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with the owners of such American steamships, for a term of not less than three years nor more than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actully traveled between the terminal points, in the most direct and feasible sailing course between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth. And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services, he shall, so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places, respectively, in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels, and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned.

The Postmaster-General, if in his judgment it be practicable, shall contract for a semi-monthly mail service between the ports of New York and New Orleans, alternately, and the port of Rio de Janeiro, under the provisions of this act.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this measure because the circumstances under which it is presented make it coercive legislation.

It assumes to aid commerce; but if it does in fact do so, the aid is extended at the expense of the efficiency of the foreign postal-service.

It makes a futile parade of advertisements when in truth and in fact there can be no competition except on two lines—the line from San Francisco to China and Japan and the line from New York to Havana.

It pretends to aid in the restoration of our merchant marine, when statistics show that the subsidies of the past have not produced such a result.

It disregards the international treaty of Berne, which went into effect June 30, 1874, and to which the Government of the United States was a party.

It is a subsidy, naked, pure, and simple—a gift of the people's money in aid of private corporations. It is a departure from that wise enunciation of the Democratic party which demands that all taxes shall be levied and used for public purposes.

Before proceeding to discuss the reasons which induce me to oppose this amendment I wish to say a word in reply to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. That gentleman, as we are all aware, is usually well informed, and always speaks with force and effect; but he has evidently not made a thorough investigation of this subject, as I understand him to make the declaration in connection with the commercial view of the question that the Red D line is one of the lines running to Brazil.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. DOCKERY. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. HISCOCK. I said since the Red D line was put on——

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well; I so understood the gentleman, and several other members on this side understood him to the same effect.

Mr. HISCOCK. If I said that, I did not intend it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Of course every one who has investigated the question knows that the Red D line does not run to Brazil but to Venezuela.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am aware of that; but I was speaking of the length of time during which there had been a reduction of freight.

Mr. DOCKERY. That there may be no misunderstanding I will be obliged if the gentleman will give me now the exact date when the Brazil line was established.

Mr. HISCOCK. According to my impression, in 1882.

Mr. DOCKERY. It was inauguarated originally more than fifty years ago.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am speaking about the present line.

Mr. DOCKERY. The present line, which has been subsidized liberally by the Government, was inaugurated, if I mistake not, in 1867.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am speaking of the present administration of that line.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am speaking of the line without any reference to past or present ownership.

I desire now to refer briefly to one or two points made by the very able gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS], who asks the House to appropriate this $800,000, and also in reply——

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman will pardon me a moment. I would like to ask him whether my statement in reference to the reduction of freight within the period of five years is not correct.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have not investigated that branch of the subject. I suppose it to be correct, for the reason that the Government of the United States has contributed abundantly from its Treasury to that company, and I should assume that the company would return in some measure the favor by reducing freights. I imagine, however, that the reduction of freight comes not from subsidy, but from the competition of foreign lines which they are compelled to meet.

Mr. HISCOCK. That was precisely my argument.

I was about to say when interrupted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], and in reply to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS], that he is mistaken in the statement that the foreign-mail service yields any revenue whatever to the Government. On page 20 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1885 he discusses the question, and states:

In no case is there any ground to affirm that the foreign correspondence affords any revenue above the actual cost to the Department of the services performed in handling it.

The argument, therefore, of a surplus revenue in this branch of the postal service, which has been invoked in behalf of this proposition, clearly fails. The Government realizes no surplus by reason of the transportation of foreign mails.

DOES IT AID COMMERCE?

Mr. Chairman, before giving in detail my objections to this measure, I desire to call attention to the array of figures presented on yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] in support of the theory that there was an inviting opportunity for trade with the republics of Central and South America, and that the one thing needful to develop our commerce in that direction was this proposed "subsidy" to American steamship lines, because the hindrance in the way of trade with South America was the lack of ocean facilities.

I shall not reply to the argument that the gentleman presented, buttressed as it was by a bewildering display of statistics, but will allow a distinguished Republican Senator, who has recently discussed this question in another body, to be heard in answer. This Senator, who is one of the ablest of the Republican leaders, expresses his views in the following language, and leaves no tenable ground upon which the gentleman from Michigan can rest his argument:

The reason for the decay of American shipping, in my judgment, will be found in the fact that American capital can be more profitably employed in some other way than in building ships. I have heard much during the continuance of this argument of the advantages to result by the proposed appropriations to the restoration of the interests of American shipping; but I have listened in vain for some information as to the reason why the men of Maine and the men of Massachusetts do not now build ships if they want them. There is no reason why they should not build ships if they desire them. They have the yards and they have the forests and they have the mines and they have the skilled labor, and if ship-building was profitable, I venture to say that the capitalists of Maine and Massachusetts would build ships; and the reason why they have not done it is because they can make more money by building railroads, and by buying Western lands, and by lending on mortgage at 6 and 8 and 10 and 15 per cent. to Western borrowers.

I do not, therefore, Mr. President, feel that this appeal to a patriotic impulse to vote for a large appropriation out of the national Treasury for the purpose of restoring the decayed interests of American commerce has much weight. Very much the same argument applies to the carrying trade of this world. There has been a unanimity of lamentation about the loss of the carrying trade by the United States, and we have been told of the disgrace and the shame that arises from the fact that the United States no longer has the carrying trade of the world. Mr. President, we did not lose the carrying trade of the world; we relinquished it. The reason why we have not the carrying trade of the world is because it is not profitable. Great Britain can afford to conduct the carrying trade of this world at a loss, as she does, because she has an insular position. There is not a point in Great Britain so remote from the seaboard that any product of her fields, that any product of her factories or her mines can not by her railway system be placed in fourteen hours in the dock ready for shipment to any portion of the world. Great Britain has an enormous excess of manufacturing facilities. She wants an enormous amount of free raw material. Therefore, Great Britain and the other continental nations so situated can afford to do what they are now doing, and that is to carry on what may be called the transfer, the transportation business of the world by water at a loss. There is to-day a million tons of English shipping that can be bought for 50 per cent. of what it cost, if anybody wants to buy it.

Therefore the reason why the United States does not do the carrying business of the world is because she can do better. It does not sound reasonable or logical or sensible to rise here and declare that the reason we do not do the carrying trade of the world is because Congress does not vote subsidies for mail pay. Statistics show better; and whenever the carrying trade of the world can be conducted at a profit, the United States of America will have their share of it. But so long as American money can be more profitably employed in railroad transportation at home than it can in water transportation upon the deep, so long it will continue to be so employed, and the voting of $100,000 or $500,000 to one or more lines of steamships for service will not prevent it, and will not help it.

We have been told also that to the south of us there is a great commercial empire waiting for the invitation of American commerce. Congress has been appealed to to vote for an appropriation upon the ground that unless it is enacted by Congress the balance of trade would continue to be against us.

There is another reason why we have not got the trade of the South American republics, one that has not been mentioned here, one that deserves mention, because it is not becoming that Congress should be held up here and fustigated and castigated for unpatriotic frugality in failing to make the necessary appropriations, whereby we are unable to secure our share in the millions of South American commerce. The reason why we do not have South American commerce is because we do not attempt to sell them the things they want to buy. The reason why our merchants and our manufacturers find no market in South America is because the merchants and manufacturers of other countries can offer them a better article at a less price. There is no want of facility of communication; the testimony in the report of the commissioners shows that the means of communication are ample, but that in their dealings with American merchants and American manufacturers they have been flouted, they have been refused credit; they have not been offered the articles they wanted to buy, and when goods have been sold to them by sample they have proved to be entirely out of comparison with those samples both as to price and as to quality.

COERCIVE LEGISLATION.

Let us examine now the legislative objection that can and properly ought to be urged against the measure. Section 3 of Rule XVI of the Senate provides that "no amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any appropriation bill." It is not my purpose to make any criticism upon the fact that this amendment comes from the Senate, despite the existence of this rule; it is, of course, well understood that the rules of this body forbid such criticism; but I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the rule, because this amendment seems to me to be obnoxious to the rule prohibiting "general legislation." It is certainly a change of existing law.

Section 4007 of the Revised Statutes provides:

That the Postmaster-General may, after advertising for proposals, enter into contracts for the transportation of the mail between the United States and any foreign country, whenever the public interest will be thereby promoted.

It will be readily observed that this section of the statute places no restriction upon the Postmaster-General. There is no limitation. Under this clause the Postmaster-General may enter into contract with American or foreign built ships for the transportation of the mails of the United States abroad. The pending amendment restricts the advertisements for this service to American built and registered steamships. It is, therefore, whether wise or unwise legislation, clearly a change of the existing statute. I may also add that section 4007 is almost identical in terms with the law of Great Britain with reference to the transportation of foreign mails. England has in the past subsidized liberally her steamship lines, and her policy in that regard has been commended by our friends on the other side as wise, statesmanlike, and judicious; but while this may be true, I wish to say that Great Britain and France never have restricted and do not now restrict their mail contracts to their own lines of steamships.

Here again, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] was unfortunate in his statement of facts, in saying that the Government of England said to her citizens, it matters not where you go——

Mr. HISCOCK rose.

Mr. DOCKERY. That was the substance of your statement—that your mails should be carried in English bottoms. The Government of England says no such thing, but under her existing postal laws advertises for her mail service without any restrictions as to nationality.

Mr. HISCOCK rose.

Mr. DOCKERY. At this time a large part of the English mail to this country comes in the North German Lloyd steamers. Neither England nor France restrict their ocean-mail service to English and French vessels. Competition is open to the steamships of all nations.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to general legislation upon appropriation bills. Any legislative proposition that is for the best interests of the people ought to be strong enough as an independent measure to win the favor of the law-making power. Of course, unobjectionable legislation might be proposed in connection with appropriation bills; but the practice is bad, and leads to just such propositions as this we are now considering. Here is an attempt, unmistakable, and well defined, to coerce the judgment of this House, and induce it to accept a measure that would not receive its favor if offered as an independent proposition. This body has, in the adoption of the new rules, abandoned the unwise policy of legislating upon appropriation bills, and it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that other bodies interested in the legislation of this country should seek rather to encourage this new departure than to discourage it by the presentation of propositions such as the one now under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, it is no use to mince matters about this amendment. Let us meet the issue fairly and frankly. It can only receive the favor of the House by the sustaining power of an appropriation bill back of it and the coercive influences necessarily incident thereto.

For myself, I wish to say that I can be persuaded to support most any reasonable legislation. My disposition leads me to desire to comply with the requests of gentlemen and render favors whenever possible; but, sir, coming as this proposition does from the Senate, circumstanced and surrounded as it is now and was in the Forty-eighth Congress, I shall never give my consent that it be enacted into law.

Mr. Chairman, I am anxious to reach the close of the present session and return to home and friends in the "magnificent Empire of Missouri," which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor; but, sir, as strong as is my desire in this direction, I am willing to stay here until the snows of winter shall mantle the heights of Arlington rather than that this House should be coerced into the acceptance of this subsidy. [Applause.]

The leaders of the Republican party in this House have almost without exception in past years opposed "riders" upon appropriation bills. In the Forty-sixth Congress, when the revision of the rules was under discussion, Mr. HOLMAN offered the following amendment to section 3 of Rule XXI:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill, or amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, &c.

This proposition authorized legislation looking to reduction of expenditures, while the amendment under consideration authorizes increased expenditure. Messrs. FRYE, Robeson, REED, and other Republican leaders expressed themselves on this question in clear and patriotic terms; and as I do not often have opportunity to commend the views of our Republican friends upon questions of public policy, I will give some of their utterances in that debate.

Mr. FRYE said:

I do not believe that the Committee on Appropriations should have the powers of legislation as granted in this rule. I agree with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Robeson] in that. When I see the Committee on Appropriations taking our whole consular and diplomatic system, and in ten days' time, without certainly any adequate or requisite knowledge of what they are doing, smash through it as a mad bull would smash through a china shop, it has always occurred to me that that committee had better attend to their legitimate business and let the business of the Committee on Foreign Affairs alone. I do believe, and my experience both in a Republican House and in a Democratic House has forced me to that belief, that there should be a restriction upon that committee; that the right of legislation, whether in reduction of expenditures or not, should be taken away from them.

Mr. REED'S terse and timely comment was in the following terms:

Both parties have been taught lessons which ought to show us that it is unsafe to have a system of legislation which is founded upon loading down appropriation bills. Whether it is done upon pretense of economy or upon a pretense of appropriating for the proper needs of the Government, it is equally wrong. But if we frame a rule—and surely we are capable of doing that—which says that the Appropriations Committee shall make no appropriations except those which are according to law, then that provision obliges all other committees to attend to matters of legislation. And I say that the scenes we have witnessed in this House ever since this discussion of rules began has been on account of the provision which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] wants to strike out.

It is not in human nature, as represented upon that Appropriation Committee, not to present legislation under that clause, and when we happen to have, as we did have in the last Congress, a gentleman on that committee who knew everything, we had a perfect avalanche of such business brought before us; and it is equally impossible that human nature, as it is constituted outside of the Appropriations Committee, can prevent gentlemen from exalting their committees just as the gentlemen of the Committee on Agriculture have exalted that committee to-day. But if we say that appropriations are to be made according to law by one committee, then we have control of the great general appropriations of the Government, and we know what we can appropriate, and then the other committees can carve out of what is left.

That is a true system; a system that is right and proper, and that enables every committee and every member to participate in the legislation of this House. I sincerely hope we may come up to the level of this question, for I believe it to be a great one, and that we will not degrade it by the introduction of partisan matters. I trust that we shall adopt a system that we shall be satisfied with, a system which we see ourselves must work well, for if we adopt it the Appropriations Committee can not put a single word of legislation upon an appropriation bill except by unanimous consent, and what more can other committees desire? We then have got a system that is philosophically correct and practically correct.

Mr. Robeson's criticism, it seems to me, should be conclusive. He says:

But there is another objection to allowing this committee to legislate, more potent to my mind than any other, and it is this: When the Appropriations Committee puts legislation on an appropriation bill they exercise duress on the judgment of the House and the legislation of the country. No man votes exactly as he would; no one is as free to act as if it were an independent proposition. All legislation is driven through under the whip and spur of the pressure of appropriations. You must submit to break up the half of your policy, or you must lose it all. You do not approve the particular proposition but you must go for it, otherwise there will be no money for the uses of the Government.

I am speaking on this subject, and I mean to speak on this whole matter broadly, not in the interest of any party, not representing the views of any faction, with no spirit other than that which looks to the good of the country as a whole; and I appeal to you, gentlemen, legislators of the United States, as you are answerable to your own consciences and to your constituents, do you mean that the general legislation of the country shall be forced through under any kind of duress at all? This idea strikes at the very end and center of a deliberative body. The freedom of all deliberation and the freedom of all action will be gone where any such system prevails.

In the Forty-sixth Congress (page 116, volume 37), Mr. Garfield, in discussing a certain "rider" that was then offered upon an appropriation bill, made the following pertinent comment upon an issue such as is presented by this amendment:

Our theory of law is free consent. That is the granite foundation of our whole superstructure. Nothing in this Republic can be law without consent—the free consent of the House; the free consent of the Senate; the free consent of the Executive, or, if he refuse it, the free consent of two-thirds of these bodies. Will any man deny that? Will any man challenge a line of the statement that free consent is the foundation rock of all our institutions?

Again, Mr. Chairman, in the Forty-eighth Congress, when the revision of the rules of the Senate was being made by that body, we find, on page 274, volume 64 of the RECORD, the following appropriate comments by Senators DAWES and FRYE:

The views of Senator DAWES are expressed as follows:

That brings me to one great defect in this report of the Committee on Rules. They have done nothing to meet the great difficulty, that while one branch is permitted by its rules to incorporate into an appropriation bill matters of independent legislation you can not in the other branch even amend the legislation which comes here. You can not offer an amendment to independent legislation in an appropriation bill which comes, under the rules of the other branch, before us, and there has been no attempt in this report, as far as I am able to discover, to meet that difficulty. Under that vice, if I may use that word without any offense, under that error, that difficulty, more trouble arises in appropriation bills, more measures are pushed through by the money power behind them in an appropriation bill, more objectionable features of independent legislation go upon the statute-book, than by any other method resorted to in Congress. It has, by that new feature of it which has sprung up within a few years, been made more dangerous to legislate, one branch having by its rules provided that independent legislation, without regard to its character or its extent, may be incorporated into an appropriation bill and be carried by the necessities of appropriations through that branch and brought into the other, where it can not under the rules of the body where it is sent be even amended; it must be rejected in toto or taken as a whole.

Senator FRYE (who is mentioned in the columns of the public press as the author of this amendment) shows that he entertained in the Forty-eighth Congress the views he so vigorously expressed on this floor in the Forty-sixth Congress. His advocacy of the pending amendment might seem to imply a lack of consistency, but I forbear criticism, as the rules forbid.

Senator FRYE said:

One criticism made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] upon the action of the Committee on Rules it seems to me is not deserved by the committee. Of course to them and to any man the absurdity is apparent of the House of Representatives having power to send appropriation bills with general legislation over here, and under our rules no power on our part to amend that general legislation. It was discussed by the Committee on Rules and certain remedies were proposed, but every remedy which could be thought of in this particular Rule XVII appeared to the committee to be an invitation to the other House to continue that rule which permitted general legislation. Then the question came to the committee. Is there any course open by which we can undertake in some way to prevent this general legislation? I think it is generally understood that there has been, even in the other House, disposition growing against that rule which permits general legislation of almost every conceivable kind, allowing general legislation decreasing expenditures, and it was hoped by the committee that under a joint rule the other House to-day might consent that this whole matter should be governed and controlled. Therefore, on page 45 of this report, Rule IV of the joint rules proposed by the committee, there is a clause which provides against all general legislation on appropriation bills. If the Senate will send that to the House and the House shall agree to it, the whole trouble will be cured at once. If the Senate will send it to the House and the House shall disagree to it, and there shall be a compromise of some kind, there may be some healing in the result of that compromise. That is the only reason why the committee did not undertake in this rule itself to provide that where general legislation came over here on an appropriation bill there should be a right to amend it.

The difficulties to which these Republican Senators referred have been remedied by the House in the adoption of the new rules, and it is now impossible to incorporate legislation in any appropriation bills. This action, in my opinion, was wise and timely, and received the sanction of the House by an overwhelming vote.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

I do not wonder that our Republican friends should seek to enact some legislation that will restore the merchant marine of this country. The long period of their domination resulted in its almost total destruction, and it is a matter of no surprise that, as they must of necessity realize their responsibility for this condition of affairs, and smarting under deserved criticism, they should seek, even at this late hour, to do something to aid in its restoration. But laying aside for the moment all other considerations, I submit, Mr. Chairman, whether it is in good taste for the Republican party, with the control of the Senate only, to seek to compel a Democratic administration to adopt their policy on this great question.

The people at the last national election relieved our friends on the other side from the responsibility which had previously rested upon their party; and in view of this fact, unpleasant as it seems to them, it is not becoming that they should attempt coercive methods. The people have charged the Democratic party with the responsibility for the conduct of national affairs, and that responsibility it does not seek to avoid.

This Democratic administration is opposed to subsidies, and it is not fair dealing for the Republican Senate to seek to compel the adoption of its policy. The Democratic party is responsible to the people, and not to the Senate, and should be unvexed and unhampered by coercive legislation and allowed to employ its own methods and policies to restore our merchant marine.

MERCHANT MARINE.

My next objection to this amendment is that while its friends claim that it aids the merchant marine, it does so—if in fact it does it at all—at the expense of the efficiency of the foreign mail service. The language of the bill is "for the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails," &c. Here the design would clearly seem to be to secure greater frequency, regularity, and speed, but if this be the object of the amendment it wholly fails in its purpose. How is it possible to secure greater frequency, regularity, and increased speed when the proposition in express terms confines the mail service to one line, and nowhere provides that the vessel shall run on schedule time?

I will give an opportunity to my friend from California [Mr. FELTON], who I know to be a good business man, to answer this question. I pause for a reply. Can greater frequency and regularity be secured by dispensing with the services of two or three lines and employing only one? And how is the increased speed to be attained when there is no provision made to secure it? I await a reply from any one, as I am anxious to know how the ocean mail service is to be expedited under this proposed law. The proposition seems to me absurd and impractical.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Does not "money make the mare go?"

Mr. DOCKERY. Money is something of a motive power; but, if you will pardon me, it does not increase the speed unless special provision is made looking to that end.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Does not the amendment itself propose that in disbursing this money the Postmaster-General shall take steps to secure greater speed and regularity?

Mr. DOCKERY. The preamble to the amendment is something like the "general-welfare" clause in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. That is very broad.

Mr. DOCKERY. The amendment says, as I have before stated, that it is for the purpose of securing greater speed, and so forth, but it makes no provision for that purpose.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I will read the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I can not yield for that purpose. I understand the amendment. It authorizes greater frequency, regularity, and dispatch; but the proposed method of its execution virtually operates as a prohibition upon the first two and wholly neglects to provide for increased speed, except by way of commendation.

Mr. FELTON. The gentleman asked me a question a while ago; and now, in reply, I ask him: Can you not safely leave that to the Postmaster-General?

Mr. DOCKERY. The discretion exercised by the Postmaster-General with reference to this question of subsidies has been so wise and judicious as to command my warmest admiration, and to win for him the confidence of the people and especially of the Democratic party. I indorse in terms positive and unequivocal without any sort of reservation his official action in relation to this proposition, and if the discretion is to be vested in any officer I desire that it should be exercised by him. But my responsibility as a Representative demands that I shall endeavor to have measures upon which I am called to vote properly framed, so as to carry out the objects for which they are intended. If we are to vote this money to these companies it ought to be carefully and properly guarded.

Mr. FELTON. And if the policy of last year is continued they will not get a cent of the money.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to say in answer to that observation that I shall not be greatly grieved if they do not; but this amendment is quite different from the law of last year.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. It ought to be.

Mr. DOCKERY. Instead of leaving it discretionary there seems to be a mandatory provision here, and if such is the fact, and it becomes law, it will be executed, because the Democratic party has never violated the law in this country. [Laughter.]

Before leaving this branch of the subject I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that under the law as it exists on the statute-book to-day, the Postmaster-General can avail himself of the fastest steamers, and in fact all lines of vessels. This amendment would deny him that privilege for the future.

Whatever may be the opinion as to the effect of this proposition upon the commerce and carrying trade of the country, it seems to me clear and conclusive that it will result in decreased foreign mail facilities.

THE SUBSIDY PERIOD.

Sir, I shall favor any practical measure that seeks to restore the carrying trade of this country to American vessels, but I do not believe that such a result can be obtained by giving a monopoly to existing American lines, as this amendment does. Let us rather favor legislation that will encourage the building of American steamships, and thus inaugurate new enterprises and additional lines of ocean transportation.

Subsidies will not accomplish this result. In corroboration of this statement I need only invite attention to some statistics showing the condition of the merchant marine from 1866 to 1877, the years during which the subsidy policy received the favor of the Government. The statistics in full will be found on pages 32 and 33 of the Report of the Commissioner of Navigation to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1885.

Now I submit, Mr. Chairman, as a fair proposition, that if subsidies will aid in building up our merchant marine should not that result be exhibited in the development and growth of this interest in the eleven years during which the policy continued? Will my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], whom I see before me, deny the fairness of the proposition I submit when I insist that if subsidies really aid in the development of the carrying trade that the fact should exhibit itself during this subsidy period from 1866 to 1877?

Let us examine the statistics and ascertain what the result was. From 1866 to 1877 the total appropriations for vessels carrying the American flag were $7,517,661.22, and but for the inordinate greed of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and the disgraceful scandal connected with the expenditure of $900,000 to debauch and corrupt the Forty-second Congress, for aught I know the policy might have been continued many years.

In 1866, the first year of the inauguration of the subsidy policy, the tonnage registered for the foreign trade was 1,387,756. In 1877, after eleven years of subsidy, it only amounted to 1,570,600. In 1866, 32 per cent. of the foreign trade was carried in American vessels; in 1877, only 26 per cent. was carried in American vessels—an absolute decrease of 6 per cent.

Mr. FELTON. Has it not depreciated since that time 5 or 6 per cent.?

Mr. DOCKERY. It has, but that does not affect my argument. The statistics show a decrease of 6 per cent. in the carrying trade for the time stated, despite the enormous subsidies of those years.

In 1866 vessels were built in the United States amounting to a tonnage of 336,146.56. In 1877 the vessels built in the United States amounted in tonnage to only 176,591.06, a decrease of 159,555.50 tons. In 1866 the tonnage of the vessels owned in the United States amounted to 4,310,778. In 1877 it amounted to only 4,242,600 tons, a loss of 68,178.

Now, I ask you candidly, as business men, do not these figures reveal the fact that subsidies fail to augment materially the prosperity of our merchant marine?

Mr. FELTON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. DOCKERY. I can yield only for a question.

Mr. FELTON. Is not the inference this: That because it failed to increase under the subsidies, and because it failed since the subsidies, there must be other fundamental reasons involved apart from the matter of subsidies?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

We do not disagree as to that; and this brings me to the practical question presented. If the subsidizing system does not augment our prosperity upon the seas, why should we be called upon to vote this $800,000 annual expenditure out of the public Treasury? Certainly no Representative upon this floor would desire to vote away this amount of the people's money unless it be that some public good was to be subserved.

The discussion of this question having conclusively established the fact, it seems to me, that this proposed expenditure will not inure to the benefit of the public, but to the benefit of private corporations only, I shall expect the House to non-concur in the Senate amendment. This question, as it relates to commerce and merchant marine, having excited some public interest, I ask to incorporate with my remarks a part of the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1885, found on pages 31, 32, which is very suggestive as to the causes that have led to this decline. His opinion, in connection with the statistics submitted, shows that subsidies will not arrest this decline and restore our merchant marine. He says:

The history of the growth and development of the commercial navies of the different nations of the world is an interesting study, but although it might in the course of centuries be expected to point out some important facts showing the cause of the flourishing or depressing periods in certain countries very little is deduced from such inquiry beyond the fact that the "price rules the trade."

A people must, of course, possess enterprise and a maritime spirit to succeed on the ocean. * * * The nation that can place the cheapest ships on the ocean has an advantage.

In our early history as a nation, before iron ships came into use, we could build a ship for less money than it could be built for in England. The timber of our forests was then so abundant as to be almost valueless, while England had to import that used by her. The materials were much cheaper here, and only that the cost of labor was greater, a ship of that day could probably be put afloat for nearly one-half the cost of the same kind of vessel in Great Britain. Our young merchant marine grew up strong and healthy under the stimulus of this advantage, which continued until after the building of iron vessels had begun in England.

It was not until after iron had become cheap and the art of fashioning it into ships had become fully developed that the demand for wooden ships for the ocean trade was brought to a pause. But, although we still build the best wooden ships that are built anywhere, and can compete with the world in that particular branch, the iron vessels of Great Britain have all the time been getting cheaper, and can now be contracted for at from £9 to £10 10s per ton for a first-class sailing vessel supplied with an East India outfit. This is actually as low as a first-rate oak ship can now be built for in this country.

The arrest or decline of ship-building for foreign trade in the United States appears to have followed the prevailing prices of the cost of producing the ship in this country as compared with the cost abroad.

I am further confirmed in the opinion that the real trouble is with the carrying trade rather than with commerce, by a conversation recently had with Mr. Ripley, one of the managing directors of the Brazil steamship line, and who has been in Washington several months past looking after the interests of this corporation. He says frankly that they now have more commerce than ships, and that they are unable to transport all the commerce that is offered, but the line declines to construct or purchase other vessels because of their inability, as claimed, to compete with foreign subsidized lines.

DO THEY NEED IT?

This line and the other ocean corporations therefore ask the Government to give them $800,000 annually to enable them to meet this foreign competition. In other words, they ask the Government to make an annual investment of $800,000 for a term of three to five years in a business that is claimed to be unprofitable. In this view of the case it becomes us to ascertain whether or not it is true that these companies are unable to compete with foreign ocean carriers. Let us therefore ascertain by a comparative examination of the American and foreign merchant marine the net income on the capital invested. I find in a recent discussion a statement made by a distinguished Republican Senator in another body, in which he says:

The best statisticians inform us that for the amount of capital employed in the carrying trade Great Britain does not receive 1 per cent. per annum upon the capital invested.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, the largest beneficiary under this amendment, according to the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, realized, in 1881–'82, a gross income of $4,124,713; in 1882–'83, $4,102,764; in 1883–'84, $4,787,899.

The net income of this corporation for these years respectively was $901,677, $912,257, and $1,393,480—5 per cent. on capital invested. England's ship-owners, therefore, realize 1 per cent. on their capital, while the Pacific Mail Steamship Company realized 5 per cent. per annum for the years named, and last year, upon a capital of $20,000,000, they realized 8 per cent.—certainly a handsome return upon the investment.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. No matter what they received; they earned it. This Government did not give them anything.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well. I am not questioning that they earned it, but if they earned 5 per cent. or 8 per cent., as they did, last year, I do not want them to come here and ask the Government to pay them tribute when the English companies with whom they compete earn only 1 per cent.

Mr. BURROWS. Why not ask how much the railroads receive.

Mr. DOCKERY. Because the question of railway transportation and rates is not now under consideration. Whenever that question is presented for discussion, my friend will find me always trying to carry out the good old Democratic doctrine of "the greatest good to the greatest number," and if those corporations stand in the way of the practical exemplification of that doctrine, I shall be found voting against them.

Mr. FELTON. The gentleman talks about what the Pacific Mail Steamship Company made last year. I want to call his attention to the fact that they did not make it out of their ocean commerce, but out of the railroads.

Mr. DOCKERY. I thank the gentleman from California for the suggestion, because it calls to my attention the pooling arrangement which exists between the Union and Central Pacific Railroads and this steamship company, by which they mutually agree to keep up freight rates, and in consideration of which the railroad companies make a monthly payment to this steamship company of $95,000.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, that thus exacts this tribute from my people, would be, under this amendment, the chief beneficiary.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. In just a moment.

It was claimed during the debate in the Forty-eighth Congress on this question that the stock of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company was owned by seven hundred different persons. Not having access to the stock-book of that company, of course I have no means of knowing just who are the holders of its stock, but I find by reference to Poor's Railroad Manual that the names of the directors of this company elected on May 27, 1885, were Jay Gould, Sidney Dillon, Russell Sage, C. P. Huntington, Henry Hart, J. B. Houston, William Remsen, J. W. Shaw, of New York, and other gentlemen who are known to this House and to the country as millionaires.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the directors of the corporation that is most active in pressing for this subsidy.

I submit herewith a table compiled in the office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, showing the service rendered by this company to the Government during the last fiscal year, the amount received for such service, and the increased amount that will be realized by the corporation should this amendment become a law.

Table showing the amount the Pacific Mail Steamship Company would realize out of the $800,000 subsidy.

Service.	Miles traveled.	Compensation at subsidy rates.
San Francisco to Japan and China	219,240	$109,620
San Francisco to Hawaii and Australia	169,150	84,575
New York to Colon	152.456	76,228
San Francisco to Panama	163,550	81,775
Total	704,396	352,198

Pacific Mail Steamship Company received for same service, fiscal year ended June 30, 1885.

Japan and China service	$3,506 64
Hawaiian and Australian service	13,565 29
Colon service	7,579 22
Panama service	1,238 44
Total	25,889 59

Number of pounds of mail carried by Pacific Mail Steamship Company for the year ended June 30, 1885.

Japan and China service	37,584
Hawaiian and Australian service	97,374
Colon service	110,169
Panama service	14,330
Total	259,457

Average paid per pound.

Service.	Amount per pound.	Subsidy rate.	Sea and inland postage.
Japan and China	$0 09.3	$2 91.6	$0 26.9
Hawaiian and Australian	13.9	86.8	42.2
Colon	6.8	69.1	17.8
Panama	8.6	5 70.6	24.4
Average	9.6	2 54.5	27.8

Increased annual compensation to Pacific Mail Steamship Company under this amendment, $326,308.41.

A glance at the table reveals the fact that of the $800,000 proposed to be given as a donation to these steamship companies the Pacific Mail Steamship Company will receive $352,198, nearly one-half of the entire amount. In other words, to state it so that the House may be fully advised, should this amendment become a law the Pacific Mail Steamship Company will realize an increased annual compensation of $326,308.41.

Now, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who is to follow me, deny the fact that I have just stated? If so, I pause to give him the opportunity here and now.

Sir, I do not believe that this House is yet ready to make such a gift of the public money to a corporation that in the Forty-second Congress debauched some of the people's representatives and fixed on them the ineffaceable stain of corruption, that "great Neptunes Ocean" can not wash away, or the oblivion of time wipe from the "table of memory." [Applause.]

NO COMPETITION.

Mr. Chairman, I urge as a further objection to this measure the fact that the advertisement provided for can not give the Government the benefit of competition except on two lines, the line from San Francisco to the East and the line from New York to Havana. There is but one American line on all the other routes, and therefore, while the bill would seem to offer the Government the advantage which it ordinarily has where competition is invited, it does not in fact do so. All the probabilities indicate that the maximum rate authorized by this bill will be secured by these ocean steamship corporations if this amendment becomes a law.

I discussed at length this phase of the question when the Post-Office appropriation bill was before this body for consideration, and therefore will not at this time tax the patience of the House in its further presentation.

VIOLATES TREATY.

Again, Mr. Chairman, there is a further reason why this measure should not be adopted. The provision of this amendment which authorizes a "rate of compensation, not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points," is in direct violation of the international postal treaty of Berne, which went into effect June 30, 1874, and to which the United States was a party. This treaty provides in express terms that the "expense of transit of mails shall be borne by the administration of the country of origin." Therefore this amendment, which authorizes compensation on return voyages, nullifies and sets at naught this stipulation of the Universal Postal Union. The United States is only bound for and can only properly compensate steamships for the transportation of mails on the outward voyage. The effect of this amendment will be to give the steamers double pay for the return trip.

The 50 cents mileage on the return trip is a gift beyond any sort of controversy, because the ship can not possibly have, under this treaty, any mail on board for the transportation of which the United States is bound either in law or equity.

The Postmaster-General, in a communication of the 17th instant, makes the following statement:

IV. The clause which has just been mentioned also contains another peculiar feature. It requires the Department to procure and pay for the transportation of mails from the several foreign countries to the United States. The Postal Union convention, of which all of the countries except those in Australia are members, requires every government to provide only for the dispatch from its own shores of the foreign mails. This act proposes that the United States, in violation of the treaty obligation, shall assume the performance of the duty of these governments in regard to sending their own mails.

Most of the companies which would be beneficiaries of this amendment now receive from those governments liberal payments for the carriage of the mails, which the amendment would require the United States to provide for.

A DISCARDED POLICY.

Mr. Chairman, my attention has just been called to the following editorial in the New York Tribune of the 18th instant:

The Tribune says:

Unhappily the Democrats have shown a decided unwillingness to change their past course on public questions of this kind. While they have followed the Republicans on various matters, they still persist in playing into the hands of England and other nations on this question of foreign commerce. The steady decline in the number of ships carrying the American flag, and the increase at our expense of the commerce of other nations, has opened the eyes of some few Democrats; but the party leaders are not yet willing to admit that they have blundered on this matter.

This is not the first time that I have heard the intimation that the Democratic party on some questions was not progressive, and that sometimes we tented on Republican camping ground as late as four years after that party had moved forward. Possibly this criticism may apply with force and effect on some few questions, but I invoke it now in behalf of my own party. Instead of the Democrats showing a "decided unwillingness to change their past course on public questions of this kind," the truth is just the reverse. They are indisposed to reinaugurate a policy which they discarded some twenty-eight years ago, and as a result of experience.

It therefore appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican party is now camping upon the ground we abandoned before the war. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You did some things right before the war.

Mr. DOCKERY. Nobody questions that.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Will the gentleman state how much money we pay for freights?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not quite catch the drift of the gentleman's question. The gentleman can state the amount.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. We pay about $154,000,000—more money than six New England States pay to all their laborers in all the protected manufacturing industries.

Mr. DOCKERY. What has that to do with this question?

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. It has a great deal to do with the question whether we will get back our commerce or not.

Mr. DOCKERY. The commerce is all right. The trouble is that it is carried in foreign bottoms.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Precisely so.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why is it carried in foreign bottoms?

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Oh, we all know that.

Mr. DOCKERY. If you do, I would like to have you answer the question. But I will tell you. It is because they carry it cheaper than we do.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Precisely.

Mr. DOCKERY. Some of our Republican friends seem to think that the Democratic party is "lagging behind" and neglectful of our shipping interests. Sir, the merchant marine was fostered and encouraged by the Democratic party when in power, and it was that party that passed the first law which gave the preference to American steamships in the transportation of foreign mails.

Section 5 of the act of June 14, 1858, passed by a Democratic Congress and approved by a Democratic President, is in the following terms:

The Postmaster-General may cause mail to be transported between the United States and foreign ports by steamship for the sea and United States inland postage, and sea postage only if by a foreign vessel, preference to be given American vessels.

When we relinquished control of the National Government we left this section upon the statute-book. It remained in force until April 17, 1862, when it was repealed by a Republican Congress.

In the revision of the United States Statutes made in 1873 it was again enacted, and is now a part of section 4009 of the present revision.

During the last seven years of Republican control, and after Congress abandoned the subsidy policy as a result of the Pacific Mail exposures and scandal in the Forty-second Congress, this law, so far as it relates to compensation to American steamers, remained upon the statute-book without being enforced, except on two lines.

The Republican administrations, with the full authority to pay sea and inland postage to American vessels, only tendered and paid this amount to a line that had a brief existence from Philadelphia to Liverpool, and to the line running from New York to Brazil. Save and except on these two lines the Republican party refused to pay sea and inland postage to American vessels for the seven years succeeding the discontinuance of the subsidy policy. I submit, Mr. Chairman, in view of this record, whether criticism does not come with ill grace from the leaders of that party?

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion permit me to appeal to the members of this House to reject the pernicious principle of subsidy.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I do not see any subsidy in it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I care not what gentlemen call it. I maintain that it is a proposition to give from the public Treasury the sum of $800,000 to private corporations.

Mr. Chairman, as I was about to say, subsidy taxes the many for the benefit of the few, and makes the business it seeks to aid selfish, grasping, and dependent, rather than hardy, self-reliant, and generous. It enervates and discourages, rather than stimulates to the exploration of new fields of enterprise.

Sir, this principle is at variance with our institutions and antagonizes the fundamental ideas upon which is founded our wise and beneficent system of government. Our fathers, driven from the Old World by the exactions and oppressions of favored classes, sought to establish here a government which should recognize the just rights of men and exemplify the doctrine of "equal and exact justice to all, and exclusive privileges to none." This doctrine was proclaimed by the hardy pioneers of the New World, who adopted as the corner-stone of the edifice they sought to erect the principle of "the greatest good to the greatest number."

Sir, this is not an auspicious time for the adoption of any measure increasing the already weighty burdens of taxation. Labor is discontented and capital hesitates to make new ventures because of so much unrest among the people. Eschewing subsidies, which only build up great monopolies of corporate wealth, let us without party distinction stand together in the effort to restore to the nation the maritime strength which made her once the rival of the proud mistress of the seas. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment that I may make a statement in reference to the Brazilian line which has been referred to?

Mr. DOCKERY. I have promised to yield all my time; otherwise I would be glad to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] to yield me a moment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will do so.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to refer to a dispatch which I have received from New York, giving some facts in regard to this Brazilian line. It states:

In 1877 no steamers; in 1878, tramp once in three months. Old American line began May, 1878; stopped May, 1881. Occasional chartered tramps up to starting of our line, January, 1883.

This dispatch confirms the statement I made in regard to the Brazilian line; and I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that he will find all my statements equally correct.

Mr. BINGHAM addressed the committee. He withholds his remarks for revision, and they will be published hereafter. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] yielded me the remainder of his time.

The House passed several weeks ago the bill making appropriation for the postal service for the ensuing fiscal year. As passed by the House the bill made appropriation sufficient to pay for the foreign mail service at the rate of sea postage to vessels of foreign register and sea and inland postage to vessels of American register. At these rates during the last fiscal year we paid foreign vessels for carrying our mails about $280,000, and American vessels about $46,000. These amounts, with perhaps some increase for growing service, would be required for the next fiscal year, and were appropriated in the bill as it passed the House. But the Senate, notwithstanding the rules of that body prohibit legislation on appropriation bills, placed upon this bill the following amendment:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with the owners of such American steamships, for a term of not less than three years nor more than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points, in the most direct and feasible sailing course between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth. And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services, he shall, so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from such places, respectively, in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels, and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned.

This amendment, if agreed to by the House, will increase the compensation for the service covered by it about $750,000 above the amount of the sea and inland postage, and to that extent is a gratuity, a subsidy. For it is not disputed that the sea and inland postage is ample compensation for the service actually rendered as compared with like service—express and package service—rendered for private individuals. It is not pretended that the actual service for the mail transported can not be performed for that amount. But the avowed object is to make such liberal compensation as will encourage American commerce with foreign countries.

Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I listened with interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who presented a very able and carefully prepared argument in support of the pending amendment. This argument seemed to be that we were not paying for the foreign mail service in our American ships a sufficient compensation for the services actually rendered. In order to prove the statement he cited numerous instances where the coastwise service was paid a much greater sum, if mileage is to be considered as the basis of rating, than the amount paid to the foreign service. He also cited several instances to show that the trade of other governments was being taken from this country by steamship lines running between Germany and those countries and between England and the countries mentioned, while our own trade was falling off, for the reason, I presume (for that was the object of the statement), that the Government of the United States did not pay subsidies, while they did. One illustration he made was that Germany sold sewing-machines in 1882 to South America to the value of $109,000, while the United States for the same year only sold machines to the value of $7,000.

Now, if there is any conclusion to be drawn from these premises it would be that we ought to pay a subsidy to our ships in order to enable our people to sell more sewing-machines, or at least as many, as Germany does; but the gentleman failed to state that Germany, during the time he selected for his illustration, the time that this trade was being carried on, did not pay her ships any subsidy at all for carrying the mails to that portion of South America. So that argument falls to the ground. She was not paying a subsidy at that time for mail service to that country when the sewing-machines were sold, and hence the argument is good for nothing. It does not fit the case, and has no applicability whatever.

Now, the other argument was that because we had to pay for certain coastwise service a larger amount per mile than for our foreign service, therefore the foreign service did not get enough. It may be possible that the coastwise service is too liberally paid; but however that may be, the measure of compensation does not depend upon the distance or the number of miles that a steamship runs. The measure of compensation for carrying our mails, it seems to me, ought to be what it is worth to carry that much weight of other matter of like quality. Should the United States pay more for sending newspapers and letters to foreign countries than the amount paid by individuals for the transportation of express packages of equal weight and of equally valuable matter?

The payment should be the same for a like service, to be determined by like space and like value; and upon what ground, therefore, does the steamship company carrying the American flag demand a greater compensation from the Government than it charges a private individual for like service? I ask on what ground? Is it because that vessel carries the American flag for its protection, a flag that will call forth every man and every dollar in this country to protect it in all parts of the world if it should be assailed? Is it for that reason we should pay a higher price for such service than is paid by the individual citizen for the similar service? Why, Mr. Chairman, if there is any obligation created by these facts, it must be apparent that it is on the side of the steamship companies.

This House, at a time when the fact was known to but few, repealed that general law which required every vessel carrying the American flag to transport our mails at the rate then fixed; that is to say, the sea and inland postage. I was a member of the House when that was done, and am somewhat careful as to what is being transacted here, but I do not know when that provision was repealed. I have heard some of the oldest members on this floor express the same want of knowledge on the subject—members like my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] who sits before me. He did not know the hour or the moment when that act was repealed by this House.

Mr. BLOUNT. It was never considered by the House or the Senate; it was cooked up in the conference committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was enacted through the instrumentality of a conference committee, and the House did not know what was being done when that act was repealed. Now, it is my opinion that an American steamship that carries the flag of our country, and gets the protection which that fact implies, ought to be compelled to carry the mails of the people of this country at a reasonable rate.

But these steamship companies, which carry the flag of our country and demand the protection of our Government wherever they go, refused to carry the people's mails after the 1st day of August last for even a greater compensation than they are paid for like service by private individuals. Let me call the attention of the committee to one of these great corporations. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, of New York, has a capital—much of it watered stock, I presume—of $20,000,000. Last year its net earnings were 8 per cent. on this capital. That steamship company, carrying our flag and demanding all the resources of our Government to protect its ships in whatever waters they may sail, refused to carry the people's mails. It went even further than this. It not only refused to carry our mails, but it prevented the Atlas Steamship Company also from carrying them. Mr. Bell, the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, thus refers to this boycotting operation on the part of the Pacific Mail Company:

Arrangements were made with the Atlas Steamship Company to convey the mails for the Isthmus and Central and South America from New York to Colon twice a month from August 1, but before its first sailing in August the company notified this Department through the postmaster of New York that it was under an arrangement with the Pacific Mail line not to carry passengers or freight from New York to Colon (Aspinwall), and that, as the Pacific Mail had given notice that it would consider the conveyance of mails by Atlas vessels as a violation of the agreement not to carry freight or passengers, the company preferred not to convey the mails to Colon. As the Pacific Mail and the Atlas Steamship Company are the only steamship lines sailing from New York for the Isthmus direct, no direct route for forwarding the mails for and via the Isthmus was available by this Department, and consequently, by agreement with the Jamaica office, it was arranged to send the mails in question from New York to Jamaica five times a month for dispatch thence to Colon by steamers sailing from Kingston for Colon not more than one or two days later than if sent from New York to Colon direct, provided close connection be made at Kingston with the outgoing steamer for Colon. The mails sent by this route include those for Colon, Panama, and for Central and South America, destinations requiring transit across the Isthmus of Panama. (Report of Postmaster-General, 1885, page 827.)

There might be some excuse for this extraordinary conduct on the part of the Pacific Mail Company if the compensation tendered by the Postmaster-General had been inadequate. But it was ample. Upon this point I prefer to let the Postmaster-General state the facts. I read from his late report, pages 41 and 42:

The general conclusion seems sustained by the facts that, except special circumstances should require a greater, the rate of sea postage is remunerative for the service of carrying the mails.

The statute authorizes the entire sea and inland postage to be paid to American steamships, although but sea postage may be allowed to foreign vessels—a proof of the legislative judgment that the latter rate is sufficiently remunerative to command the service, as the fact is.

This statute appeared to afford power to make abundant compensation for all the service necessary until the next session of the Congress.

The accompanying tables, prepared in the foreign mails office, show that this would have yielded to the following American companies, on the basis of last year's business, respectively:

To the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, on its New York and Colon line, $19,275.82, as against $7,501.78 at sea postage, and $7,679 at its parcels-dispatch rates, and $411.40 at its freight rates, for nearly 55 tons of total mail; an average of $507.26 per trip for 288 pounds of matter, which it would have carried for $10.82 at freight rates, and $202.09 at parcels-dispatch rates.

On its San Francisco and Panama line, $3,496.18 for about 7 tons, against $1,238.44 at sea postage, $71.69 at freight, and $1,002.55 at parcels-dispatch rates.

The Government was paying on that line $3,496 for the same service for which it charged individuals $1,000—upon the same kind of parcels—express packages and other valuable matter:

On its San Francisco and Yokohama line, $10,125.80 for less than 19 tons, against $3,506.64 at sea postage, $226.34 at freight rates, and $3,758.40 at parcels-dispatch rates.

So it is upon all these lines. The report continues:

On its Australian line, $41,018.65 for about 48 tons, against $13,565.29 at the special rates paid heretofore, $762.93 at freight rates, and $9,537.40 at parcels-dispatch rates; an average per trip of $3,155.28 for 7,336 pounds, nearly fifty-four times its freight rates, over four times its parcels-dispatch prices, and a better average price per trip than the average paid across the Atlantic by $2,505.92.

To the Venezuelan Red D line, $3,942.86 for about 8 tons of mail, against $1,392.95 at sea postage, $58.34 at its freight rates, and $1,155.01 at its parcels-dispatch rates.

To the New York and Cuba line, $5,203.48 for about 12 tons, against $2,271.94 at sea postage, $61.63 at freight rates, and $1,548.17 at its parcels-dispatch rates.

To the New York, Havana and Mexican line, $11,932.11 for about 25 tons, against $4,134.13 at sea postage, $129.17 at freight rates, and $3,229.33 at parcels-dispatch rates.

These facts seem to prove that the total sea and inland postage is an abundant recompense for the proposed service; and, without further recapitulation, reference to the tables will show the amounts to the other lines a proportionate compensation. If this be correct judgment, no more could be rightfully expended of the appropriation unless other objects were to be sought than the care of the postal service.

It thus appears that the American mail steamship companies received three times as much for carrying the American mails on their lines as was charged private individuals for like service. We paid to the American and foreign ships for carrying our mails last year $331,000. Gentlemen on the other side of the House now come forward and ask us to pay $800,000 for the service on American ships alone. As before stated, the total amount of the sea and inland postage to which the American vessels were entitled during the last year was less than $50,000. During the present fiscal year, except in a few cases, our mails are being carried for the sea postage only, and they are carried as expeditiously as they have been heretofore, which proves that our Postmaster-General can secure the speedy dispatch of American mails for the sea postage only. And yet gentlemen on the other side of the House demand that we shall pay $800,000 a year for that service, more than we are now paying. Upon what is this demand based? The claim is that it is for the purpose of aiding American commerce and of building up our American merchant marine. I want to call the attention of the gentlemen to the fact that the company that is to receive the greater portion of this large subsidy—for that is what it is——

Mr. BINGHAM. It will receive $160,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will receive that amount if the Senate amendment is reduced to $400,000. But if the Senate amendment is agreed to it will receive $320,000. That company, that is to receive $160,000 or $320,000, as the case may be, of the sum appropriated in this Senate amendment, by their last annual report showed net earnings of over 8 per cent. upon their twenty millions of capital stock, and declared a dividend of over 5 per cent., and they had a cash balance of nearly half a million dollars in their treasury.

Mr. BINGHAM. They have lost a steamer since then.

Mr. SPRINGER. My friend from Pennsylvania says they have lost a steamer since then. I presume, if they were good business men, they had the steamer well insured and are whole on that transaction. Then, having lost their steamship and got insurance money, I suggest they build another steamship and put it in the service and carry the mails at reasonable rates.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand they carry their own insurance; they insure themselves.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then they charge a certain rate for the purpose of securing their own insurance, which amounts to the same thing. If they can make it more profitable to insure their own vessels than to patronize insurance companies, then they make an additional profit on their business. So you can take either horn of the dilemma, and you will find the company is doing well all the time, as they tell us in their advertisements and as was stated in their last annual report for the year ending April 30, 1885. Let me read from the published report of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company:

Herewith annexed you will find statement of the business of the company for the past year, which is unusually satisfactory as showing net earnings of over 8 per cent. for the year, with a business outlook for the future that promises better than at any period of our history for the last ten years. On the 31st of December last the company paid off the entire amount of its indebtedness to the Panama Railroad Company, and the earnings since that time have sufficed to continue dividends at the rate of 5 per cent., leaving the company at the present time with a cash balance of nearly half a million of dollars.

I read from the report of Mr. J. B. Houston, president of the company, and addressed to its stockholders, for the year ending April 30, 1885.

This prosperous company, having an unusual run of business for the past year and with the brightest prospects for the future, comes before this House and asks us to subsidize it by giving it a bonus for carrying the mails of the United States. As my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] intimated, the directors and principal stockholders of this company are not of that class of our citizens who are entitled to subsidies or Government aid.

The names of the directors of that company show that they are all able to support themselves and take care of their private business without subsidies from Congress. If gentlemen will turn to Poor's Railroad Manual they will see that the directors elected on May 27, 1885, were Jay Gould, Sidney Dillon, Russell Sage, C. P. Huntington, Henry Hart, J. B. Houston, William Remsen, J. W. Shaw of New York, and other gentlemen who have ample means and do not need subsidies from the Government in order to make their business profitable. The company is already paying 8 per cent. upon a largely augmented and watered stock. Their balance-sheet shows that the vessels they have and the real estate they own have cost only $12,500,000, and upon that actual value of $12,500,000 they declared net earnings last year amounting to nearly $2,000,000.

But nothing seems to satisfy steamship companies any more than other corporations. Their cry is continually for more, and the American Congress, the representatives of the American people, are asked to give them this large bonus of $800,000, when the Postmaster-General informs us that he can secure the same service by paying the amount of the sea and inland postage, which for the last fiscal year was less than $50,000. He is procuring the service for this year for less than that amount. The adoption of the Senate amendment will not secure greater efficiency in the foreign-mail service. It will only increase the cost but will not improve the service, nor will it benefit American commerce.

The report of Mr. Bell, the Superintendent of the Foreign Mail Service, demonstrates conclusively that we can secure a better and more expeditious foreign-mail service under the system adopted by the present Postmaster-General than under the contract system proposed in the Senate amendment. There is but one line of American steamships running between this country and Europe—that between Philadelphia and Liverpool. Under the rate of sea and inland postage we pay that company $1,416 a year. If $400,000 even are voted for the American lines on the basis proposed in the Senate amendment, that company would receive $25,000 a year for the same service. If that company is now carrying our mails on the days its ships sail for $1,400 a year why should we pay it $25,000? Perhaps some gentleman on the other side of the House will be able to explain. I can not see it.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who favor this Senate amendment tell us that it does not carry a subsidy. At the same time they tell us we should agree to the amendment and make this large appropriation in order to aid in building up our foreign commerce. Unless it is a subsidy, what aid can it give to commerce? If the amount to be voted is the actual cost of the service, how is American commerce benefited? We are now making appropriations for the postal service of this country, and not dealing with foreign commerce. If gentlemen desire to vote subsidies for that purpose let them bring in a bill for that purpose, that we may know exactly what is intended.

If time would admit I could demonstrate conclusively, I think, that our foreign commerce can not be restored by giving subsidies to ships. If we ever expect to get our share of the commerce of the world we must permit trade with other nations. If we expect other nations to buy from us we must permit them to sell to us. Our tariff laws impose duties on imports from foreign countries to the amount of 40 per cent. When we open our ports to the commerce of other nations theirs will be opened to us upon a profitable basis of mutual exchanges. But I have no time to elaborate this proposition during this debate.

I hope this Senate amendment will be voted down, and that our Postmaster-General may be permitted to secure the carrying of our mails as is now being done. He is entitled to the thanks of the country for the course he has pursued already, and this House should sustain him. He does not want this Senate appropriation, and we ought not to force it upon him.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE].

Mr. LORE. Mr. Chairman, after one year's consideration, I see no reason why I should take now a different position than was taken by me during the last Congress upon a like measure. With many other Democrats, I voted for the $400,000 amendment in the appropriation bill of the Forty-eighth Congress, and I want to say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that the vote in the Forty-eighth Congress upon the $400,000 amendment was a vote not given under pressure, or under any influence other than the enlightened conviction of the men who voted for the amendment, that it was in the line of wise statesmanship. It was the expression, sir, of men who fearlessly represented their constituencies on this floor, and who could not be deterred by the hackneyed cries of fraud and subsidies so ingeniously and persistently iterated by its opponents.

This proposition, as I understand it—and I think we all have a very clear apprehension of it now—is simply to place in the hands of the Postmaster-General the sum of $800,000 with which he may pay a liberal, or it should be said rather a fair, compensation to American-built steamships for carrying our mails to foreign countries. I do not believe, sir, that any patriot can look upon that map in front of the Speaker's desk, on which are marked the routes of the different steamship lines, and not feel his cheeks suffused with the blush of shame. Not a single line of American steamships is there on the western coast of South America, while the ocean is literally ribbed with the tracks of European steamers that are reaping her rich harvests, and we sit supinely by at the mercy of other nations. Why is this so? Their lines plow the intervening oceans from one end to the other. From Europe to the Western continent (which heretofore has been considered ours) you find line after line of European ships, but no American. How have those lines been established? I assert, sir, without fear of contradiction, that they have been established largely if not entirely by subsidies or by the payment of liberal compensation for mail service. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has furnished to this House a table which I desire to insert here:

Subsidies paid to steamship companies during 1884.

It shows a long list of the nations that have built up their mercantile marine by compensation for mail service or by subsidy, and gives the amount expended by each during 1884. Among them I find that even so small a country as Roumania—Roumania, struggling for existence—appropriates $984.87 for this purpose, while the other countries named in the list expend various amounts, increasing in rapid ratio until you come to France, which appropriates $5,152,388.98 to build up her merchant marine.

Those foreign lines, established originally by liberal compensation for the carriage of the mails or by direct subsidy, are the very lines that are now receiving from the American people $280,000 for carrying our foreign mails, while our own lines receive but $46,000. I think my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] will admit all our American steamship lines were built up originally and sustained by the liberal policy of the Government from 1866 to 1877.

The American lines are now asked to compete unaided with the foreign lines still sustained in the manner I have stated by their respective governments, while we have not only ceased to aid our own, but have thrown every embarrassment in their way. Sir, we would not to-day have a line of steamers to any foreign country to carry our mails were it not for the fact that the Government at one time recognized the necessities of the case and gave them liberal aid. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] says that our commerce was not increased during the period of such Government aid, from 1866 to 1877. I admit that in the aggregate tonnage was not increased; but the gentleman overlooked one very material factor; he overlooked the fact that from 1866 to 1877 while there was no marked increase of tonnage there was that marvelous transition from sail to steam tonnage, from the wooden clipper to the iron and steel steamer, which multiplied the carrying capacity of vessels and made our commercial marine equal to at least one-third or one-half more ships. But, sir, he forgets that we owe even the shadow of a merchant marine on the ocean to the bounteous aid of the Government which is so strongly condemned. If it had not been that the liberal hand of the Government was stretched out from 1866 to 1877 there would not have been an American line of steamships any where to which we could have even offered liberal compensation to-day.

Mr. Chairman, I am free to say that if this proposition were presented to us in the form of a bold and naked subsidy—if it were a proposition that Congress should give to the respective lines the amount of money named in this amendment for the purpose of building up or helping to build up the American marine, I would vote for it, if such result could be obtained in no other way. In the last Congress we endeavored to remove some of the restrictions upon our American merchant marine; and under the Dingley bill a number of them were removed. It is now proposed to give an impetus in another direction—not to give a subsidy (it can not properly come under that term), not to give excessive compensation for carrying the mails, but to give only such compensation as you are giving to your coastwise steamers and your railroads.

The men who oppose this appropriation of $800,000 for this purpose are in this very bill voting away millions of dollars to the railroads owned by these bugbears, whom some of my friends here scarcely dare to mention except with bated breath—Jay Gould, Russell Sage, Dillon, and Huntington. You are appropriating millions of dollars for carrying the mails upon the railroads owned by the great corporations which these men control. But because, forsooth, they may get some of the money proposed to be paid under this amendment for building up the American merchant marine, this House is invoked with spasms of terror not to vote for the amendment lest Jay Gould and Russell Sage and Dillon and Huntington may receive some part of the amount. If there be force in such an argument then we should cut off the appropriation to the railroads.

But, sir, if you measure the compensation proposed to be given to these different steamship lines by the amount now paid to many of these railroads, by the amount now given for star-route service, by the amount given to your coastwise steamers and your steamboats plying up and down your rivers, the compensation here proposed is but a bagatelle. It is much less than is given on many of these routes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LORE. Certainly.

Mr BLOUNT. I wish to inquire of the gentleman which line of steamers he would take as the true test of the proper compensation to be paid? The steamers engaged in the coastwise and the inland service are paid different rates, according to the particular contract; and the rates vary with almost every line. Which would the gentleman adopt as the true test for proper compensation?

Mr. LORE. You might take the average for coastwise service or the average pay upon your railroad lines, and if you add all considerations into account, such as the character of the steamers required, the long routes, and competition of foreign subsidized lines, I submit that the amount proposed to be given here would be only fair compensation.

Take the line of steamers running from San Francisco to China and Japan, with not a stopping place from terminus to terminus. It is an American line floating the American flag. There are no intermediate stopping places from which that line can obtain business. The service is to be measured largely by the distance traveled, and the compensation should be the value of the work done in running five or six thousand miles without any stopping places. Now take many of the routes of which the gentleman speaks. The coastwise steamers can afford in many cases to accept comparatively low rates for mail service because all along their routes there are stopping places where they can gather trade of every character, which helps to pay expenses and necessarily enables them to carry the mail at low rates.

Take your star routes. You are paying none of these for mail transportation upon the basis of the number of letters carried or the quantity of mail matter. If that were the basis, the rate would be in some cases 50 cents a letter for every letter carried. You can fix no general and universal rule of compensation. You must take the circumstances of each particular case. And when you do so, measuring the compensation by the methods I suggest, I submit to my friend from Georgia the compensation proposed to be given under this amendment is not equal to that allowed either upon the star routes, the coastwise routes, or upon many of the railroad routes.

But there is another consideration. I believe not only that the compensation here proposed is just and proper, no subsidy, simply fair compensation for the work to be done, but the very lines which it is proposed by fair mail compensation to help are the lines which to-day connect us with the central and southern portions of our continent. There are fifty million people in Mexico, Central and South America who are to-day, with outstretched arms, asking us to come and take their commerce. That commerce amounts to $820,000,000. It is a harvest so rich that the countries of Europe vie with each other in the ambitious effort to secure its wealth; England, France, Germany, Italy, Norway, are gathering from South American soil the bounty that rightfully is our heritage.

They send out their swift steamers, liberally subsidized, to these inviting lands, while we sit idly by the great ocean highway, and through the mouths of unwise economists periodically and spasmodically cry out "subsidy," "fraud," and turn over again to our sluggish sleep.

How much of that $820,000,000 of Mexican, Central and South American commerce lying at our feet is carried in American vessels? About 10 per cent. The residue is carried by lines of European steamers, which have been established by subsidies in the way of liberal compensation for carrying the mails. When asked to take, not speculation, but the experience of the nations of the earth as our guide, in order that we may accomplish like results, that is, cover the seas once more with American-built, American manned and registered vessels, to extend our trade abroad, increase our commerce, and enhance our wealth, the corruption of the dead past is conjured up as an insuperable barrier and the abuse of a wise system instanced as the rule.

It has been said that we can have our foreign mails carried in foreign bottoms cheaper than by American steamships. Yes, to our shame, to-day they are carried in foreign bottoms; they are carried by foreign steamship lines, which have been built up and strengthened by the system of subsidies adopted in competing countries, and with the mails they are carrying all but about 17 per cent. of the $1,300,000,000 commerce of the United States with foreign countries. The United States is paying $140,000,000 in freight to foreign steamers, and unwisely refuses to grant fair compensation to our own steamships that are struggling unaided to win back their lost carrying trade. We are paying millions for tribute, refuse thousands for independence. Shall we allow the great commerce of this south country also to fall like a ripe apple into the laps of England, Norway, Germany, and France, whose "tramp" steamers to-day are to be found in every one of our harbors, flaunting their banners defiantly in our faces? If so, take down the American flag from every masthead, build a Chinese wall along our 10,000 miles of seacoast, and frankly admit our commercial imbecility.

On the Delaware River only two years ago we had four fine ocean steamers, owned and run by American capitalists, from Philadelphia to Liverpool, which carried the American flag—they were the Pennsylvania, the Ohio, the Indiana, the Illinois—competing as passenger carriers with European lines. I watched them with patriotic pride as they steamed up and down that broad river, and hoped they had come to stay. The United States Government turned a cold shoulder to the enterprise. I ask my friends where they are to-day?

Mr. MCADOO. I believe they are in existence.

Mr. LORE. They are in existence, but degraded to transports; not a passenger walks their decks. Instead of carrying passengers across the ocean they have become little better than freight tramps, seeking cargoes as best they may. England always fed such children, and she has a line to every leading port in this country. We starve all such. We have not an American steamship to-day carrying passengers across the Atlantic. Two hundred and fifty thousand immigrants, great numbers of business men, and pleasure-seekers from Europe land upon our shores each year, and they came not in American but in foreign steamers; while back again hundreds of thousands pass each year, and not one is carried in vessels bearing our flag. We, as my facetious friend said the other day, have not on the Atlantic Ocean two logs fastened together with ropes, and a hoop-pole mast, bearing the American flag at the masthead [laughter] to symbolize our great maritime nation.

Then, I ask, is this Congress to be frightened by the names of Jay Gould, Russell Sage, Dillon, and Huntington? I imagine the Democratic party is not made of such stuff as to be scared in that way. It sees the possibility of rehabilitating the American merchant marine. No specters invoked from the distempered imaginations of gentlemen who fear another era of corruption should stay this work. We have a Democratic administration pledged to economy and honesty. We have a Postmaster-General in whose hands we may safely intrust the distribution of this fund. He will see to it that not one dollar is wasted. Let the experiment be tried. It is in the right direction.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURROWS. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to recall the attention of the committee to the exact issue presented to us. The House has adopted a paragraph appropriating the sum of $375,000 for foreign mail service; $315,000 of this sum will be required to pay for the transportation of transatlantic mails and incidentals, and only $60,000 remains to be used in paying for the transportation of mails to the West Indies, Central America, South America, Asia, and the Australian colonies by American steamships. The Senate has amended that paragraph by adding an appropriation of $800,000 for the transportation of mails by American steamships to the various countries I have named. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has moved a proviso by way of an amendment, not to change the intention of the Senate as we learn from the discussions which took place in that body, but, on the contrary, to make clear what it is intended to accomplish by this appropriation.

It is provided that not exceeding $400,000 of this amount shall be appropriated as compensation for existing American steamship lines in carrying the American mail according to schedules heretofore in force, and that so much of the other $400,000 as may be necessary shall be used according to the discretion of the Postmaster-General in establishing new steamship lines to various ports in the countries named, and for increased frequency of service on those lines already existing.

The question involved is whether the $60,000 appropriated by the House is sufficient to give fair compensation to American steamship lines already in existence, or whether the amount shall be increased by placing at the disposal of the Postmaster-General not exceeding the sum of $400,000 as compensation for those lines, the balance to be employed in establishing new lines and increasing the frequency of their trips. Gentlemen will see from the maximum amount placed at the disposal of the Postmaster-General for all American steamship lines now existing, on the basis of the service in the past, only $400,000, that it can not be in any sense a subsidy according to the European idea, where a million of dollars or more is to be given to a single line for the purpose of establishing postal and commercial connections.

But here is only $400,000 to be placed at the disposal of the Postmaster-General for the whole of the twelve existing American lines of steamships, not exceeding that amount, and as much less as he can procure contracts with them for this service.

It seems to me the practical question for us, as reasonable business men, is whether or not $60,000 is a reasonable and decent compensation for the existing lines of American steamships for the services which they have been accustomed to perform, or whether, on the other hand, that amount, which is to be placed in the hands of the Postmaster-General for securing the service should not be $400,000; and further, whether it is not wise to place in his hands $400,000 additional for the purpose of establishing new lines of American steamships and increasing the frequency of the service to the ports of South America and Central America, and the other countries mentioned in this amendment where we have not already postal and commercial communication.

There has been a great deal of declamation here with reference to this proposition, I take it not intended for gentlemen who are members of this House, but for effect outside; because it can not be possible that such gentlemen as I see before me, and whom I know to be intelligent and usually reasonable and candid, should stand up in this House and declaim about the wickedness of the "immense expenditure" proposed in the way of a subsidy to be given to American steamship lines.

I want to call the attention of the committee to exactly what this Senate amendment, as the gentleman from Michigan proposes to make clear its purport, is designed to accomplish and what it will provide as compensation for the various American steamship lines as compared with what was provided in the House paragraph.

By the House provision, which appropriated only $60,000 for American steamships, in order to give sea and inland postage to all existing American lines, it is necessary first of all to drop out from all consideration and all compensation two existing lines, and not give them anything, namely, the Cuban line and the Mexican line. Further, as to the Australian line let me call your attention to this fact: The sea and inland postage would give to the Australian line $41,000, which would be a decent compensation under the circumstances, and is made so because the Australian colonies are not in the Postal Union, and consequently postage on all letters to these colonies continues at 12 cents. Therefore a compensation of 12 cents as sea and inland postage would give a decent compensation, in this case amounting to $41,000, to be paid to that line. But mark you, instead of giving that amount to this line, which has done so much to develop our commerce, it is proposed by the House provision to give that line not a cent from the Treasury of the United States.

How is this brought about? In this manner: A private arrangement has been made with the Government of New Zealand, which has a contract with the steamship lines connecting Australia and San Francisco, by which they have secured the transportation of all of their mails at an annual compensation of $150,000. Through this arrangement with the Government of New Zealand that colony says, "You dump all of your mails into our mail-bags and pay us $20,000 a year, and we will take care of them."

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. What do you mean by a private arrangement?

Mr. DINGLEY. I mean an arrangement entered into by the Postmaster-General with this Government of New Zealand without authority of law. Therefore, to prevent the payment of $41,000 to the Australian mail line, under the existing law giving that line the sea and inland postage, this private arrangement is made, whereby the steamship company is not to get a cent from this Government, and we get our mails transported for $20,000. Thus we save $21,000, and only about $40,000 of the House appropriation will go to American steamship lines.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, is that worthy of a great nation like this?

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; although my time is very limited.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did not this line refuse to carry the mails?

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course we understand that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company declined to accept the sea and inland postage of 12 cents on this line, because it involved the acceptance of the sea and inland postage of 5 cents on all their other lines. But I am speaking now of the next fiscal year for which this appropriation is made. It would require $106,000 to give existing American steamship lines simply the sea and inland postage; and the House has appropriated only $60,000, and got around the difficulty in the manner I have suggested. That is the House provision which we are asked to insist upon.

What do we give to the American lines under the House provision? I speak to gentlemen as reasonable business men, as men of candor. This is in no sense a party question. It is simply a business question; and I appeal to you as candid business men to look at it in a business light. I want to ask you as fair men if you think that the amounts the House proposes to pay American steamship lines are fair or decent. What do we propose to give the American steamship line which connects San Francisco with China and Japan, a distance of 6,000 miles, or 12,000 miles on the round trip? Just $10,000—no more, no less. On the other hand, we are paying the little steamboat line from Norfolk to Baltimore, a distance of 200 miles, $18,000.

And yet gentlemen who think that $18,000 for the Norfolk line is fair compensation stand up on this floor and defend the appropriation of only $10,000 for mail service to China and Japan as ample, abundant, and reasonable. I ask gentlemen to consider this discrimination against American steamships in the foreign trade and ask themselves if it is just. Divest yourselves of prejudice in this matter. I regret very much to have seen in the course of debate a tendency not to deal with this question in a spirit of candor, but to throw in our faces certain phrases, and endeavor thereby to turn away the attention of this committee from the exact facts at issue and create prejudice against this proposition.

Look at the facts. We have an important steamship line connecting New York with Brazilian ports and running as far as Rio. The distance is 5,500 miles, or 11,000 miles on a round trip; and what does the House appropriation give that line? Only $5,791! And gentlemen stand up here and say this is fair compensation. No wonder, when you propose such compensation as that for carrying the mails to American steamships, you think it necessary to follow it up with a compulsory bill obliging American steamships to carry the mails at the compensation offered under the penalty of a refusal of a clearance.

Mr. BLOUNT. Allow me to say to the gentleman that there is another line which is anxious to take it at that compensation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly that may be done by a British line sailing under the British flag, and with capital furnished by Great Britain.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is as much capital in that line as in the other.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the gentleman from Georgia did not mean the New York and Brazil mail route, because there is no other line to Brazil. The gentleman was thinking of the route from San Francisco to China and Japan.

Mr. BLOUNT. I took your illustration, which was the compensation for carrying the mail to China.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was through with that. I am now speaking of the line to Brazil. I ask the gentleman from Georgia, and I ask him because I know him to be a candid man—I ask the gentleman to say if he thinks $5,791 a year for carrying our mails from New York to Brazil, a distance of 5,500 miles, is sufficient compensation?

Mr. BLOUNT. It depends on the standpoint from which the gentleman looks at it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask you if it is sufficient from any just standpoint?

Mr. BLOUNT. I say I take their rates for dealing with the public, and judged by that standard this is more than ample compensation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman say $5,791 is ample compensation for carrying the mails that distance? If so, if that is ample compensation, in Heaven's name what are we paying everywhere else in our domestic service for carrying the mail?

For carrying the mail between Tampa and Key West, 246 miles, we paid last year $23,600; a distance of only 246 miles, and a mileage both ways during the year of only 50,000 miles, as against a mileage of 134,004 miles for the Brazilian line.

Mr. DOCKERY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does not this amendment propose to pay 50 cents a mile on the return voyage, when there is no mail on board, which the United States is liable to pay for?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will come to that in a moment. I may say in passing, however, that the Brazilian line could not be paid over $50,000 under the Senate amendment as modified, which would be less than the Tampa line is paid,

I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to the immense disproportion between the rates we propose to pay American steamship lines which happen to be in the foreign service and what we pay to those engaged in the coastwise trade. We have an American line from New York to Venezuela which makes a mileage of 208,000 miles a year; and for carrying the mails the House appropriation proposes to allow that line $4,000, or 4 cents per mile one way. Yet the British Cunard line, which carries a large part of our transatlantic mails, will be paid 40 cents per mile one way out of the House appropriation. Gentlemen can but see that when such a discrimination is worked out against our own lines which carry our smaller South American mails, that the basis of payment by weight, without regard to distance, is wrong. Gentlemen surely can not mean what they say when they stand up and assert that such compensation as the House proposes to give American steamship lines in the foreign trade for mail service is reasonable. You know, gentlemen, they are not fair and reasonable. They are not decent.

No nation gets its mails carried for such a compensation as we propose. Of course you need a compulsory law, and even a law that will give authority to confiscate private property in steamships, if you propose to give only such compensation as this for mail service. If gentlemen would examine this subject candidly they would not propose anything of the kind. The moment you have reasonable compensation the steamship lines are glad to take the mail. They do not need compulsion more than stage-coaches on the land do.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest——

Mr. DINGLEY. I must decline to yield further, as I have only a few minutes left.

What is proposed by the Senate amendment as modified by the proviso of the gentleman from Michigan? I ask if it approaches the idea of a subsidy in the European sense? What would the China and Japan line get under this amendment, even supposing the whole amount of $400,000 should be paid to existing lines? It would get $50,000. Is that a subsidy in any objectionable sense? Only $50,000 for carrying our mails on a route of 6,000 miles! Why, gentlemen can not mean what they say when they characterize such payments as these as subsidies in any improper sense.

On the basis of a payment of from $350,000 to $400,000 to existing lines the Brazilian line would receive only $50,000; the Australian line, $42,500; the Venezuelan, $50,000, and the line to China and Japan, only $50,000. And the payments in all these cases would be only a fraction more than that we pay the British Cunard and White Star lines. Why is the payment to American lines characterized as subsidy and that to British lines fair mail pay?

We pay $29,700 to the coastwise steamers which carry the mail between Tacoma and Port Townsend, a distance of 98 miles; the total mileage in a year one way being 60,000 miles, and the payment per mile being about 50 cents. You call that fair mail pay! Why is not the same rate per mile fair mail pay for an American steamship line in the foreign trade?

I wish to call attention to the two maps which gentlemen see hung before the Clerk's desk. These maps were prepared, as I understand, by the Post-Office Department. On the map at the left hand are shown the American steamship lines, connecting the United States with the various countries of Central and South America, Australia, and the colonies, and with China and Japan. Notice the small number of lines there shown.

Turn now to the other map, which shows the British, German, and French lines connecting those European countries with the West Indies and with Central and South America. When you compare the two maps, do you wonder that we can not secure a larger amount of trade with Central and South American countries? There is hardly any means of direct postal commercial communication between the United States and any of the South American ports. But, on the other hand, notice the net-work of lines connecting these ports of the countries of South America with the countries of Europe. It has been well said to-day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] that the history of the world shows that foreign trade follows the flag. That is true, sir, and unless means of communication, prompt and frequent, can be availed of by the merchant, you can not expect to build up a trade with any country. There are Central and South America lying before us, which last year had a foreign commerce amounting to eight hundred and fifty millions, of which we obtained only one hundred and thirty millions.

The exports of South and Central America last year were $430,000,000. We took a larger proportion of their products than we exported to them of our products. We took from the South American countries last year $90,000,000 of their productions. How much did we export to them? We bought from them $90,000,000 worth of goods and we sold them only $40,000,000. Why did we not sell them more? Partly for the reason that there are no means of regular, frequent, and prompt communication between this country and any portion of South America except the one line that runs to Rio.

Now, everybody knows that it is only as you have ready communication that trade can be built up. There can be no question that if we had direct, frequent, and ready steamship communication with the South American countries business could be built up to a very great extent between the United States and those countries. They do not buy of us, because the products that they would purchase from us are to a large extent those that they must have promptly, and for that prompt and regular means of communication are absolutely necessary. It so happens that these South American countries lying close to our doors are non-manufacturing countries. They have the raw products that we want, and nearly all of which are admitted free of duty into this country.

They, on the other hand, want our productions. They want our food products. They want our common cotton cloths, for cottons are the chief textiles used in the South American countries. They want our machinery. They want thousands of articles that we could supply them, and that we would supply them if we had proper means of communication. In reading the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] (I trust he will give me his attention for a moment), I saw, very much to my surprise, a statement that we could not supply the South American countries with the coarse cotton cloth known as standard sheetings because the English manufacturers could supply them so much cheaper. He stated that plain standard sheetings could be furnished by English or other European manufacturers at 5¾ cents per yard, while the same goods obtained from the manufacturing establishments of this country would cost 9¾ cents a yard. I wondered where he got such information as that, but on turning over the statistics that accompany his speech I noticed that the Superintendent of the Foreign Mail Service supplied the figures.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. I noticed them at least in connection with the report furnished by the superintendent, and naturally supposed that he was the authority.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, that is a very different thing. There are a great many things in connection with it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the fact that he can go into any store in Washington to-day and buy at retail plain standard sheetings at 7 cents a yard; so it can hardly be possible that the manufacturer sells them by the bale at 9¾ cents a yard. In my own city there is a mill producing largely plain cotton cloths to be shipped to China, and they are being shipped there and sold by the side of the English products at precisely the same price, quality for quality.

Gentlemen will bear in mind that in the production of these common standard sheetings three-fourths of the cost is in the raw material; the labor is a small item, and such goods we can produce as cheaply as any nation on the face of the earth. When we come to the finer products, where labor more largely enters into the cost, we are of course distanced on account of our higher-paid labor; but we can compete in such coarse cotton goods as are largely used in South America. In the gentleman's own city there are manufacturers who can supply South America as cheaply as England can if they can have direct, regular, frequent postal and commercial communication by steamship lines. It will of course take some little time to build up the trade and find out what is wanted; but give us the means of communication and the rest will follow. I mention this, Mr. Chairman, to show that there is a large range of productions in which we can compete with foreign nations in the South American market.

Our farm products, our agricultural machinery, our coarse standard sheetings we can produce and sell as cheaply as like articles can be produced and sold anywhere in the world. Now, it is this class of products, as I have already said, that South America wants, and yet we can not send them to her because we have no direct, frequent, regular means of communication.

Look at Brazil. Last year we bought of Brazil nearly $50,000,000 worth of her products, almost all of which came in free of duty, and yet we sold her goods to the mere beggarly amount of eight and a half millions.

I mention this, Mr. Chairman, in order to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we can not in this matter lose sight of the fact that the opening up of trade with South America is an exceedingly important object, which this Congress ought to have in view, and one which will justify the most liberal appropriations to American steamship lines for the purpose of establishing prompt and frequent postal and commercial communication with those countries.

But I must hasten. There is a third point to which I wish to call attention. It has been said in the progress of this debate that it makes no difference whether our mails are carried by American steamships or by British steamships; that while we would like to have American steamships engaged in this businesss, yet if British steamships can do the work more cheaply let them do it. Now, if we should apply that same principle to all other industries—to the coastwise trade for instance, and to the ordinary industries of the country—where should we be? But in the maintenance of a merchant marine and in the establishment of steamship lines there is something more than an ordinary industry.

The merchant marine is to every country the militia of the seas. No nation can maintain an efficient navy without an efficient and prosperous merchant marine behind it. That is the experience of all the nations of the world. Besides, by encouraging the establishment of American steamship lines we provide in the most economical manner vessels for use in case of war as light-armed cruisers and as transports. In case of war, if our mails are carried upon foreign steamships, those vessels are liable to be taken from us; and if the nation which owns them is the one with which we are at war, they are at once turned against us. But if our mail-carrying steamers are owned and controlled by Americans and registered as vessels of the United States, then the Government can put its hands upon them and can use them in defense, as an aid in distributing its troops and as light-armed cruisers.

The ability of England to-day to defend herself as a nation depends more upon her great steam marine, upon which she can lay her hands in case of war, than upon the naval vessels which she maintains in commission. Five hundred thousand dollars expended in this way for building up a few new steamship lines to encourage postal and commercial communication with the South American countries with which we are not now in connection, to extend and promote our trade, to open new markets for the Western farmers, for the manufacturers of the East, and for the workmen of the country, will give us steamships which, in case of war, will be worth more to us than any cruisers that we could build with $2,000,000 expended for that purpose.

There is more in this policy, which is to be inaugurated or set aside by the vote that the House may now or hereafter give on this question than many gentlemen here seem to think. If this Government refuses to give proper and efficient assistance to its steam marine, it allows the European nations by the aid of their great subsidies to seize upon every avenue of trade. We shall not only lose our trade to a great extent, but we shall lose the steamship lines which now exist. It is impossible that these lines can be maintained permanently unless there shall be some assistance in the way of fair compensation for mail service. Let me read from the foreign dispatches a telegram published only three days after the action of this House in refusing to appropriate more than $60,000 for the foreign mail service:

LONDON, April 8, 1886.

The Imperial Government [of Great Britain] has decided to subsidize a new line of steamers between British Columbia and Hong-Kong and Australia by paying $100,000 annually for ten years. The steamers must be first class and capable of carrying guns and troops, and if required the government shall have the right to use the steamers in the event of war.

Canada, as poor as she is, has added a sixty-thousand-dollar appropriation for the same purpose, making $160,000 to open up a new line of steamers from British Columbia on our western coast to Hong-Kong and the Australian colonies—a line intended to compete with and drive off the American steamship line now running from San Francisco to the Australian colonies and Japan.

We look on and see these things transpiring before our eyes and content ourselves with saying, "Although Great Britain and Canada give $160,000 to establish a line that is to come in direct competition with an existing American line and turn the trade of Japan, China, and Australia away from us, yet if we give $10,000 it is all we ought to do; but if we give $50,000 it is a wicked subsidy, that ought to consign gentlemen who vote for it to some unpleasant locality."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor and said: I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not wish to occupy two minutes. I desire only to make a single remark. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] was unkind enough to say that I had taken my statistics as to the prices of American and British cotton goods in Rio from the Superintendent of Foreign Mails. I desire to inform the gentleman that I quoted from our consular reports—Republican authority. I got the information from the State Department, as the latest information in its possession.

Mr. DINGLEY. I simply wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that common standard sheetings could be bought here in Washington for 7 cents a yard.

Mr. BLOUNT. The statistics to which I referred did not purport to date of to-day; they gave a comparative statement; and I referred to the comparison as shown by them.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman having mentioned 5¾ cents as the price for standard English sheetings, I desired to say that goods of similar quality could be bought for about the same price from the manufacturers of this country.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. MORRISON. I desired, when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] was on the floor to ask him a question. Perhaps it would hardly be right to make the inquiry now, as he might not have time to answer. But as he is a gentleman who always has a ready reply, I will take the liberty of making the inquiry now, with my reason for making it.

The gentleman from Maine, as well as several other gentlemen, has said in the course of this debate, and it is perhaps true as to some of the articles mentioned, that we can make cotton sheeting and some other articles at such low cost we might sell them in or exchange with the South American countries if we only had ready communication. He said, too, that we bought from Brazil $50,000,000 in products annually, which come in free of duty, and sold to her people eight and a half millions; that if we had direct communication we could have exchanged probably to the full extent of our purchases or a greater extent.

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not say to a fuller extent, but built up greatly.

Mr. MORRISON. Well, to a fuller extent than we have sold. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Maine what we did with the fifty millions' worth of goods we bought from Brazil? We must have brought them here, and I would inquire why the ships that brought fifty millions of heavy products to us should not and did not carry out our cheap products to these countries south of us, Brazil and others?

Mr. DINGLEY. All our vessels were sailing vessels; but of course goods can not be sent in sailing vessels in modern times.

Mr. MORRISON. They only come to and do not go from us? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be a good day for the United States when our legislators shall recognize there are no international analogies so far as our country is concerned. It is idle for gentlemen on this floor to be continually pointing to Europe on all economic and even political questions. On all matters of governmental business we always have paraded before us the circumstances and policy of European nations, more especially Great Britain.

Now, physically, and I refer to the physical geography of our country, and politically and socially we are so far different from Europe there is no analogy whereby comparison can be instituted. There never was a country founded, nor situated and circumstanced like ours.

It is idle for gentlemen to resurrect the romantic fable of Greece and Rome. There is no analogy between this Republic of thirty-eight sovereign States to universal suffrage, perfect legal equality, and general intelligence, and the semi-caste-founded republics of the olden time. There is no comparison even between our Republic and the modern Republics of France and Switzerland. Therefore neither on this floor nor elsewhere can there be instituted comparison between our country and any other on the face of the globe. What may be eminently proper for them may be entirely wrong for us and against the very fundamental principles of our system. What their geographical position may demand ours may render totally unnecessary. The commercial laws of a small island may not be suited to govern a whole continent. Monarchical and paternal government can furnish no example for republican rule.

But forgetting all this, some gentlemen seem inclined to adopt and try all these English and Continental panaceas for commercial, labor, and other troubles, and which, in my judgment, are not suited at all to this country. When you compare the two countries physically see the divergence; there is an island that is but a patch of sod upon the Atlantic, and here we are the legislators for a continent. The laws that might benefit the one can not benefit the other, even if they could be enacted without violating the spirit of our institutions.

There can be no institution of comparison between our people and the people of France. France is obliged, in order to maintain her political supremacy, to enter into commercial competition with Great Britain. And Great Britain is compelled to have a foreign commerce. The British Empire, so far as Great Britain and Ireland are concerned, can not maintain itself unless it sends out its commercial feelers, as it will, into every portion of the globe. And here you have what would make the whole of Europe. You have difference of climate, and I might say difference of people and difference of production—the varied productions, the climates, conditions, and physical differences of a world all in your own country.

Did you ever think of this fact? The people of nearly every other country are migratory. Emigration and exile are painful but common household words in all Old World lands. The breezes that blow inland on the vaunted British Islands carry the sighs and sobbed adieus of British subjects. Other people are emigrants, and this Heaven-blessed land is to them the haven of rest. Our people, thank Heaven, are not forced out on the pitiless ocean to seek homes and trade and labor in foreign lands. The vacant chair of the adventurous emigrant stands a monument of regret in nearly every European home. Let us avoid the causes that produced this mournful exodus from other lands.

We have a Europe of our own, and the true cause why there is not upon the high seas the American flag as plentifully as that of these maritime Old World nations is that since the war we have been developing this vast continent. The energies and the wealth of our people have been directed in creating, not a mere maritime power, but to develop this wonderful continent. When this continent is sufficiently developed, and when it becomes necessary to plow the seas as well as the land, we shall go upon the broad ocean, and I will trust to the genius and the wealth and the power of the United States to make itself felt on the high seas as it has on the land to-day. [Applause.]

I have before me here an address delivered by Mr. Charles S. Hill before the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce. He asks the question why we have not American ships, and says:

> Because the subsidized steamship companies of foreign nations instantly drop their freight rates 50 per cent., relying upon their home statesmen and subsidy, and because the British Lloyds underwriters instantly rush to their assistance and depreciate the standard of the American ship by rating our ship enviously and jealously below the inferior ship of the Clyde.

Now that is not so. That is not the difference. Let us understand this thing and be honest about it. The trouble lies just here: it is the cost of labor. Why, sir, if you were presented the English Cunard Steamship line, to sail it under our flag with the large subsidies or bounties they are said to receive for carrying the mails, you could not contend a day against the other lines; and it is because the labor and the materials into which our labor enter are more expensive. That is the reason that these lines can not run advantageously with the same freight parallel with cheaply run foreign steamships.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let me interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. McADOO. I have but a few moments.

Mr. McMILLIN. Carrying out that same idea. Before the Shipping Committee appeared a number of expert gentlemen on this subject, and they said that if the ships were given to them they could not afford to run them.

Mr. McADOO. I believe, Mr. Chairman, it is admitted here that the difference in the cost of running an English steamship as compared with an American steamship is 25 per cent. With the Italian, Norwegian, French, and other nations the difference is very much greater.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What makes the difference?

Mr. McADOO. I can not yield, in the short time I have, for interruptions.

If we are going to compete with the foreign lines that cost 25 per cent. and even much less to run them without subsidies, then we will have to add 25 per cent., and even much more, beyond the highest subsidy paid by any foreign nation, beyond the nearly twelve millions paid annually for many years by the other nations with their cheap labor, to be able to compete with them upon the seas. In saying this I believe I state the case correctly, and if I do, who is prepared to enter upon such a tremendous scheme? If we are going into this international struggle for commercial supremacy upon the seas we will have to give additional subsidy beyond what the other countries pay in order to overcome their cheaper running expenses. Now I can not say I grieve at this. This is the slight cost, if cost at all, we pay for the greatest and best of all markets—the home market, and for having the best paid and most independent and intelligent labor on the whole globe. If you are bound to compete, you must reduce wages. Who will vote to reduce the wages of labor? Not one, I hope. Will we ever have a powerful merchant marine? Yes, undoubtedly, when our necessities demand it. All the advantage is with us. The nations of Europe are overdoing the carrying trade; they are engaged in a death-struggle.

Bounty against bounty, subsidy against subsidy, ship against ship, line against line, and all the while a constant drain on their frightfully overladen tax-payer. Few, if any, of these lines pay dividends. They are exhausting themselves, while we are strengthening ourselves. Our great rival feels keenly the loss of our markets, and when the real struggle comes, if we keep on as we have in the past, we will find her strength sapped and we will be master of the situation. Yes, without forcing events, a great American marine, unrivaled in the past, is coming. I say they are overdoing it. Look at the English ocean tramps, such as survive the deadly perils of storms and their own frailty! They cover the waters from Terra del Fuego to the Thames, from Montreal to Melbourne, and that too, by the way, without the blessings of subsidy. They do not live well, to be sure, but if our subsidy friends are correct, the wonder is they live at all.

Why, Mr. Chairman, look at the very absurdity of the argument. Mr. HILL says that the Lloyds treat our American vessels unfairly. If that be true, is it not equally true that they will treat the subsidized ships just as unfairly as those that have no subsidy? Will the mere fact of granting a subsidy make a difference in their action, and if we put a subsidy on the ship, will the British Lloyds, if this charge be correct, desist from the conspiracy to underrate and undervalue and generally conspire against American shipping?

Now I know my time is limited and I must hurry briefly over these points. Another point to which I wish to allude. I have read with a glow of patriotism the extraordinarily able report of Thomas Butler King, a Representative from the State of Georgia in Congress, in favor of, as gentlemen on the other side tell us, the subsidizing or giving large bounties to American shipping. But, Mr. Chairman, times are changed since Mr. King wrote that report. If he were present and participating in this debate to-day he would not, I believe, advocate this proposition. What was his object? To make a quasi-navy. In those days the merchant ship was readily convertible into a man-of-war. There was no very great difference in their construction.

Wooden ships composed our Navy; wooden ships were all the rule, both in the Navy and in the merchant marine; and in the event of a war it was well known that the wooden ships of the merchant marine could be quickly transferred into fighting ships for the Navy. But it is widely different to-day; and it is idle for gentlemen to say that if you subsidize the American vessels engaged in commerce that in time of war you will have there a strong arm to protect the coast, assert our rights and dignity, and defend our domestic commerce as well as our merchant marine upon the seas. The man-of-war of to-day is a special creation provided for that particular business, and no subsidized or unsubsidized merchant vessel would be able in any naval contest to maintain herself against a modern man-of-war. So the argument which was given at the time of the inception of the system of giving bounties to American shipping, to create a quasi-naval arm by stimulating the merchant marine, has ceased to have any weight so far as this Government is concerned by reason of the advance in naval architecture.

I said, Mr. Chairmain, at the outset of my remarks, that I did not believe we could build up a merchant marine by subsidies; I know you can not do it by a gratuity. If it can be done by subsidy, if that is the only remedy, and I do not believe it is a remedy, then, as a Representative, I would meet that matter squarely face to face as a business proposition; and if a subsidy is the only remedy, let us go about it in a business-like way. You say you want to enable our merchant marine to compete with the subsidized marine of other countries richly subsidized, and against these immense subsidies you want to spoon-feed our American marine with watery gruel in homeopathic doses. [Laughter.]

The passage of this amendment will not, in my honest judgment, add a ship or a man to our merchant navy. It will go to a few existing lines and give them an advantage over new American lines that may be built. It will go into well-known hands and into coffers not empty. In saying this I have no prejudice. Not one millionaire could find it profitable to build, equip, and run the finest American vessels under the American flag. I love that flag, without or with an appropriation, as much as any man living. I hope to live and know it is on every sea, powerful, respected, honored, ay, loved by all peoples who love liberty. For all honest, just, practicable laws that will advance American ships and American shipping I will be found an advocate, even to the extent of differentiating in their favor. The day may soon come when an American zollverein will be formed and the trade of this western hemisphere become ours against all comers. Then new ships and new lines will come of necessity. Ships of themselves do not make commerce. Commerce begets ships. The arguments for this amendment are very plausible and quite forcibly and adroitly put, and we, seeing the patient so ill and weak, are supposed to be willing to try any remedy. This remedy would prove as inefficacious as feeding a consumptive on snow balls. There has been, besides, a tainted atmosphere around all this legislation in times that are past. Let us not be carried away. This money belongs to the whole people, and we must be sure we are spending it wisely and honestly.

I yield to no man on this floor in my Americanism. I care more for the prosperity and welfare of the meanest flatboat that was ever poled on the Mississippi River than I do for all the ships that have floated the English flag from the days of Alfred to the reign of Victoria. I am more interested in the humblest cross-road blacksmith-shop in the last county of Texas than I am in all the mills, looms, and ship-yards of Great Britain from John O'Groat's to Land's End. [Applause.]

As to how subsidy has operated in France, I call attention to this late report of our agent:

> The ships that were to be built and navigated with the aid of the government were to carry French manufactures into foreign markets, and so encourage and extend domestic manufactures and open new vents for home-made wares. Unless the statistics are false this result has not been attained, and it would almost seem as if there had occurred a mere transfer of carriage.
> Did this transfer of carriage from foreign to French vessels involve a decrease of freights peculiar to French tonnage, a saving to the French shipper alone, at least commensurate with the cost of the bounties, something might be said in favor of the policy. Under those circumstances the nation would have a larger mercantile marine and a larger share in the carrying trade at no cost to itself. There is no evidence, however, that such a result has followed; and while the bounties by stimulating ship-building and ship navigation have increased the available tonnage beyond the requirements of traffic, the consequent reduction of freights has involved a loss and not a gain to the French nation, by throwing upon it the burden of a shipping interest that but for the government aid would have been unprofitable, and that because of such aid can not conform itself to the demands of trade—the only basis that will insnre profit and permanency.

As to England, hear the eloquent and fearless gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] in his speech of yesterday:

> What has England profited by this system? A few great merchants and great corporations have enriched themselves at the expense of the masses of the English people. The people have been ground down; their wages have been reduced more and more; and in order to keep up this system thousands upon thousands of precious human lives were sacrificed to the greed and the fiendish avarice of those merchant princes of England.
>
> I say, Mr. Chairman, every million of mammon acquired in the foreign trade of England was bought at the price of human blood. All the oceans upon which the merchant marine of England floats to-day can not wash that stain away. The smell of blood is there, and all the perfumes of Arabia can not sweeten it. Let other countries have the trade with these countries. Let them have their trade, their discontent among the people, and their constant wars, while we in this blessed land of ours, on the other hand, secure our own market, accompanied by prosperity and the blessings of peace. Let the English and the French strike their balances. Let them add up the sums they have paid for subsidies, the hundreds of millions of dollars swallowed up by their wars to protect their foreign commerce, not counting even the thousands upon thousands of human lives sacrificed in that cause, and then count the actual gain realized, and see whether the balance will not be on the wrong side.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCADOO. I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. STRUBLE. I should like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. The pending question has been discussed at length and with more than ordinary ability. I would hardly feel justified in occupying the attention of the committee further except for the purpose of calling attention, after a brief statement, to one main feature of the policy involved. Gentlemen seem to be conscious that the idea of subsidy, the building up of the interests of a particular class of citizens or a particular industry at the expense of the whole people, is an un-American policy, and on that account have sought with great ingenuity of argument to show that this measure does not involve a subsidy but simply fair pay to the steamship lines for the transportation of the mails to foreign ports.

Now, sir, the fact can not be concealed, looking at the subject from any conceivable standpoint, that the amount proposed to be paid under the pending amendment is enormously in excess of the charges made and compensation received by American steamships or any other ships carrying our mails for transportation of commodities requiring the same degree of care and involving the same responsibilities. We are informed by the Postmaster-General in his last annual report that the rate now paid for the transportation of our mails in American steamships is thirty-four times as great—I believe I am correct in the figures, large as they are—as the amount paid for the transportation of merchandise under conditions requiring the same degree of care and responsibility, and four times the cost of transporting commodities in parcels where there is absolute insurance of safe delivery, the latter feature not being exacted in the transportation of the mails, only reasonable and proper care and vigilance.

The following are the exact words of the Postmaster-General on the subject:

> The actual service rendered by the carrier consists in taking the mails from the post-office at the port of departure, inclosed in locked bags (of leather for letters, and usually of canvas for paper mails), conveying them to the vessel, depositing them in the "mail room," to remain until arrival at the port of destination, when the bags are conveyed to the post-office. The mail room is commonly a small interior room occupying no more, and no more valuable, space than the passengers' baggage-room. In some vessels it is sheathed or ceiled with thin iron. Besides providing this room and keeping it securely locked, no special guard or care is required during the voyage, unless some accident demands. No responsibility as an insurer rests on the carrier. Such liability for loss as he undergoes is dependent on proof of negligence; and probably few, if any, instances of pecuniary mulct for such loss can be found.
> The "express" or "parcels-dispatch" service, which is performed by these lines at the rates indicated on the tables, appears quite as burdensome and expensive as mail carriage. Parcels are received from various persons, conveyed to the ship, transported to the port of destination, and delivered to the consignees there; and the price for carriage usually covers an insurance of $25 on each parcel and all port charges, except customs duties.
>
> The baggage of passengers imposes as much trouble, cost, and burden on the ship as the mails, except that it is received and delivered at the ship.
>
> On the other hand, in most ports vessels which carry the mails receive special advantages; in some, only greater facility of entering and debarkation; in many, exemption from port charges of various kinds and different amounts. Incidental benefit arises from the repute of Government employment.
> It will be seen at once from the accompanying tables that if the quantity of mail carried be considerable the compensation is generous. The total weight of the transatlantic mails carried from New York last year by eight lines of ships was 2,194,066 pounds, and at sea postage yielded to the carriers $270,157.63, the compensation varying from $2,854.39 for the most profitable trip to 19 cents for the lightest, and averaging $609.36 per trip the year through. This was over thirty-four times what the same weight of freight would have been transported for, and nearly four times the charge for parcels of dispatch matter of the same quantity; and these rates increase in disproportion on the better trips on which, in fact, the mail was chiefly carried. These figures prove the rate of sea postage to be abundant. Undoubtedly the transatlantic carriage could be procured at lower rates, if it were desirable to forego frequency of transmission and employ but one or two lines instead of all.

As far back as 1862, when our own ships, under the protection of our flag, refused to carry our mails at reasonable rates, Postmaster-General Montgomery Blair, under President Lincoln, wrote the following letter on the same subject:

> POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., March 3, 1862.
> GENTLEMEN: I have received formal notice from Cornelius Vanderbilt, controlling the steamship line to Aspinwall, that he will not take the South Pacific or any other mail after the 21st instant. This is an attempt to coerce Congress to contract with him on his own terms for carrying these mails. I called the attention of Congress to the coercive system exercised by the railroad companies upon the Government in my annual report. I trust suitable measures will be adopted before adjournment to maintain the public interests in that behalf. But this steamboat coercion requires immediate attention. Unless something is done at once the vast mercantile interests will be seriously affected.
>
> My own opinion is that this and every other line of steamers leaving our ports should be required to take mails to their ports of destination upon such terms as are now or may hereafter be allowed by Congress as the condition of their clearance. It is not pretended that the compensation now given is not sufficient for the service rendered. No private person pays them for any kind of transportation at the rate paid by the Government for mail matter. We give all and more than we make out of it, and no persons are so much benefited incidentally as the owners of the ships, for the bulk of the correspondence relates to the trade carried on by their vessels.
> Yours, respectfully,
>
> M. BLAIR, Postmaster-General.
> Messrs. COLLAMER and COLFAX,
> Chairmen, &c., Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is not that true of our letter postage; that it is immensely greater than it costs to send packages and goods according to weight?

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend refers to our policy here in our own country, of course I answer yes; for, so far as our internal policy is concerned in regard to contracts for carrying the mails, under the provisions of the Federal Constitution of course an entirely different policy prevails from that which has relation to our foreign affairs. The diffusion of intelligence among our own people and facilities for intercourse between them stand on a basis entirely different from that of our intercourse with foreign nations.

Here at home the force of competition and the necessity of furnishing our whole people with postal facilities control the service.

I find among the numerous appeals made to the House since this measure has been pending none more patriotic and florid in its terms or more exacting in its demands than one that comes to us from a body of gentlemen of enterprise in the Southwest. That body do not think proper to hide behind any specious argument, but make an appeal direct. They say:

> Let us resolve that our merchant marine must and shall be revived; ay, by a subsidy, the only means of honestly obtaining what our national needs demand.

That is the appeal which comes to us. It hides behind no subterfuge. It says it is a subsidy that is demanded. And the body of gentlemen who have surrounded the Capitol during the last few days do not put it on different grounds. They urge it as subsidy pure and simple that will revive American shipping.

Take one of our greatest lines, the Pacific Steamship Company, running from San Francisco to China and Japan, an American line owned in part by Americans and in part by English capitalists, and sailing under the American flag and greatly favored in former years. That company declined to transport your mails under the reasonable rates which have been prescribed by law. Another line in competition with it, the Occidental and Oriental Steamship line, having the same kind of vessels and running between the same ports, has been cheerfully transporting your mails without any hesitation under the rates prescribed by law—the sea postage—from the Pacific coast to those remote countries. If one line can carry at the rate prescribed by law, and it is proposed to pay the other vastly more for the same service, is not that subsidizing it? The foreign line of vessels, without any subsidy from any government, transports your mails at what your Postal Department asserts is a fair and reasonable rate, and makes no question as to its fairness. The other demands vastly more, and you propose to grant this demand by the pending proposition.

I do not believe any of the expedients resorted to in former years under the mistaken policy that is now again being urged on Congress ever had the least appreciable effect in stimulating our shipping interests. They had not up to 1859 when the former effort was abandoned, nor at any subsequent period. It has been said in this debate—I refer to the fact only incidentally—that our trade with Rio has recently been affected beneficially by the establishment of a line of steamers. You have had a steamship line to Rio for years; you have one now without subsidy; and your sailing vessels have to a greater or less extent brought the products of that country to our shores and carried ours to a limited extent to Brazil. But the period of subsidy, $150,000 a year for a short period, produced no appreciable result upon that trade. The same trade which before existed exists to-day somewhat enlarged; it was not increased by the subsidy. This became so manifest at the end of a short period of time that the law authorizing the subsidy was permitted to expire by its own limitation; while our carrying trade with the Sandwich Islands, which amounted to nothing while we paid a subsidy of $75,000 a year, grew to large proportions under the reciprocity treaty.

Sixteen years ago this House organized a committee which was directed to visit the various cities of the East and inquire into the causes of the decline of our shipping interests. That committee, of which Hon. John Lynch, then of the city of Portland, Me., was chairman, visited all the leading cities of the Eastern section of the country; and in the ponderous volume submitted to Congress by that committee containing the evidence taken and its final report there is no more intelligent statement of the cause of that decline or of the remedy than is found in a single passage in the testimony of Mr. W. H. Derby, an intelligent business gentleman of the city of Boston. He says:

You will aid shipping more by reducing the duties than in any other way. I speak as one in favor of protection incidental to revenue. I do not speak as a free-trader. I do not go to those extremes. Perhaps I am not wise in not going further than I do. I stand on moderate protection. Your protection to-day is 48 per cent. on an average on everything you import. How was it before the war? Fourteen and a half per cent. was the average. Is Congress aware of that great disparity? Is Congress aware that we have crept up from 14½ to 48 per cent. duty on everything we import? Does Congress believe that 48 per cent. is a proper stage of duties, or that we are to maintain them at those rates? Is it just to this nation to do so?

Of all the opinions expressed before that committee in your commercial cities, no statement of the cause of the disappearance of our ships from the ocean is so well fortified by facts as this which I have just read, and yet after sixteen years our tariff taxation remains substantially the same.

But, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that gentlemen deal with this subject and with the American people unfairly when they talk about this being a question of commerce. Our commerce is not declining; our commerce grows steadily with the advance of years. Our shipping interests, our carrying trade only have declined, and they have declined for manifest reasons, in addition to the burden imposed by our excessive taxation. Of those reasons I know of none so obvious as the fact that the American capitalist has been able to invest his money in more remunerative enterprises. When he enters into the carrying trade of the world (the most cosmopolitan of all employments), he comes directly in competition with the people of all other nations, and must adopt their frugal methods and must be satisfied with their small profits, or must go to the wall. If it is to his advantage to put his vessels under the flag of a foreign nation, as it frequently is in the interest of economy, he does not hesitate to do it. But generally our capitalists prefer more lucrative investments at home.

Let gentlemen make their appeals to the American flag as much as they may, the fact remains that sixteen years ago when this inquiry was made by the committee I have named, and up to the present time, a very considerable portion of our capital has been invested wherever it could be advantageously done in foreign shipping doing business under the flags of other nations. At the time of this inquiry two iron ships were being built on the Clyde by American capitalists with the avowed purpose of putting them under the British flag and holding them under bottomry bonds. So, sir, the question upon the part of the citizen investing his capital is not one of the national credit. It is not with him a question of national pride in the flag of his country, but a cold, deliberate calculation of moneyed profit in the carrying trade of the world, and from that standpoint alone can this subject be fairly presented by gentlemen who ask for this subsidy in behalf of the carrying trade on the oceans which alike concerns all nations. Low taxes will generally secure the flag. Citizens do not hesitate to engage in the carrying trade of the nations sailing their ships under the flags of the nations where the greatest exemption from taxation exists. I hold in my hand an article clipped from the Boston Herald, one of the most intelligent of our great commercial newspapers, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. I ask the Clerk to read the article.

The Clerk read as follows:

SHIPPING INTERESTS.

The depressed state of the shipping interest, due to the falling off of merchandise exchanges between the great nations of the world, has had an exceedingly disastrous effect in England upon those belonging to the class of seamen. It is asserted that men can readily be obtained as common sailors who have certificates showing that they have passed an examination entitling them to go to sea as mates and captains of vessels, and not infrequently men have been shipped as sailors who, two or three years ago, were in command of vessels, and lost this position simply because there was not business enough to keep employed the vessels with which they were connected. This statement of the condition of maritime affairs in the largest and most successful shipping nation in the world is sufficient to prove that this is not a peculiarly favorable occasion in which to endeavor to encourage and build up the American shipping interest. If the English shipping merchants are losing money on almost every venture they make, it would be worse than useless for us to vote away the public money by endeavoring, directly or indirectly, to subsidize American merchant tonnage.

But, Mr. Chairman, I sought the floor not for the purpose of discussing except in a preliminary way the question whether this was a subsidy or not, or to what extent subsidy can revive our shipping interest, but for the purpose of presenting another view which I think underlies this whole subject. I believe, sir, that this measure involves a policy of Government which ought to arrest in a very marked degree the attention not only of this House but of the American people. The small sum of money involved, $800,000, is of but little moment. It would not be felt by our Treasury; it would not be felt by our tax-paying people. But, sir, this is one of a class of measures which up to this time have produced, as I think, only injury and disaster to the country. The point to which I desire to ask attention is so well and briefly suggested by an article in a leading commercial newspaper of the city of New York that I ask to have the article read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Commercial Bulletin, October 26, 1885.]

THE GOVERNMENT NURSE.

Is there no way of eradicating from men's minds the pestilent fallacy that it is the function of republican government to provide (1) sinecures for persons who have no means of self-support, and (2) access to the public Treasury (i. e., the tax-payers' pockets) to individuals who are unable to carry on their private business in competition with other people, except at a loss?

Under monarchical or despotic systems, where the king or the kaiser can do no wrong and where class legislation has been countenanced from time immemorial, a policy of that character is comprehensible. There the people are simply machines for providing means for the tax-gatherer, and as long as the despotic or monarchical system exists there is absolutely no help for them, save in revolution or emigration. But in this country, where the people are supreme and have no owner but themselves, any policy which proposes to deal with them as if they were servants or slaves that somehow have an all-powerful master veiled under the forms of government is to be reprobated not only as unjust in itself, but a flagrant usurpation, and from every point of view unrepublican and un-American.

Mr. HOLMAN. That article presents the point to which I wish to call attention. I do not hesitate to say that in no instance in our history where the Government has gone out of the legitimate province of government and sought to promote special interests at the general expense by subsidies, no matter in whatever form presented, have the results been otherwise than injurious to the country. I concede very cheerfully that in a few instances prior to 1860 the Democratic party departed in an evil hour from the great principle that underlies its political creed, that Federal legislation should be confined strictly to the domain of government; but in no instance was any beneficial result secured. No such result was secured by the subsidies given prior to 1858, in the vain attempt to extend our shipping, and the system broke down in 1859 by its own weight, as then all men saw that this artificial system, however it might enlarge and build up the estates of a portion of our people, could not by any possibility operate beneficially to the whole country or secure permanent results except in disordering the social condition of our people.

But what has been the history of subsidy in this country. What has been the effect of our past legislation, the attempt, through the aid of Congress, yielding to the never-ending pressure in favor of special interests, to build up the fortunes of men engaged in some special pursuit or occupation? What are the fruits of this system? Does any gentleman believe it possible that during the last twenty-six years such an extraordinary change could have occurred in the material condition of our people as that now unhappily displayed if the Government had confined the exercise of its powers inside the simple realm of government? Does any citizen believe that in the absence of this policy of subsidy, this employment of the power of the nation to promote special interests, the present condition of our country would have been reached, the old-time equality in the condition of our people so completely changed? The root of the present disorders now confronting the American people is to be found in the policy involved in this seemingly unimportant proposition to give $800,000 a year for five years to the class of citizens owning and navigating ships. Until the policy established by our fathers of a radical departure from the traditions of Europe, and its methods of government in marking out a new policy under which the interests of all men should be alike protected, limiting government to the simple duty of securing the public peace and the administration of justice—until this policy was abandoned, the future of our Government as a strong and vigorous republic, stronger and more vigorous because of the equality of condition among our people in material affairs, was absolutely assured.

But, sir, the policy of subsidy was adopted, and for twenty-six years it has controlled affairs. It appeared at an early moment in the methods of your financial system and the adjustment of your great public debt. Men who were able to control your affairs and give color to your class legislation could not forbear seizing upon the opening opportunities, nor could the men who saw the opportunity. You can compute with safety hundreds of millions added to the wealth of a favored few of your people and placed as an oppressive weight upon the shoulders of labor by the various measures through which your legislation passed in adjusting and readjusting your financial system and the great debt of the nation. No monarchy in all history presents an example of such rapid accumulation of great estates by favorites of government.

Under the argument of opening up the country and the rapid development of its resources you granted imperial subsidies in lands and exhausted the patrimony of your people; and what, sir, have been their fruits? I admit the tendency has been to rapid development in wealth, in towns, cities, and estates, but has it been that kind of development the American people ought to desire? Is it that order of development, of general advancement and peaceful and prosperous homes which it was the interest of your people to secure? Is the development secured by these vast subsidies consistent with the principles of your free institutions and the substantial equality of your people? Or, on the contrary, is it not a departure from those principles and a development of national resources on the methods of the Old World fatal to the hopes of the New?

Why, sir, the imperial estates you have created, the more than baronial possessions you have established by your class legislation and subsidies through your great land grants, pledges of the public credit, public bonds, and financial methods are without example. Can any human being foretell the extent to which those measures, made in the interest of favored classes under the pretense of rapid development of the resources of our country, may change the character of our institutions and the destiny of the American Republic?

Congress was appealed to by the skillful and unscrupulous to open up highways of improvement, to better the conditions of labor, as though this could be brought about by opening up unbounded opportunities for the acquisition of fortunes. The inevitable result came remorselessly and steadily; wealth increased in an unexampled degree, but it was not the wealth that cheers and invigorates labor and builds up prosperous and happy homes, but the wealth of great estates. Why, sir, thirty years ago a large private estate was so rare in this country as to command special attention. Very few of our people were rich and very few of them were poor. Every successive measure that looked to the interest of the few instead of the simple duties of the Government to the many, to all alike, has created and increased estate after estate until changes in the condition of a people greater than the human race has ever witnessed has occurred in the lifetime of a single generation. Overgrown fortunes, spent largely in foreign countries, with such ostentation as to bring republican institutions, if possible, into disrepute, or at home in princely luxury, setting an example of idle display to our people, while arousing indignation on the part of those who justly feel that the Government has been unjust, an order of things exceedingly unfavorable to the maintenance of the public peace and the perpetuation of the true spirit of our republican institutions.

Sir, could any gentleman have doubted, in view of the happy condition of our country from which this period of lavish subsidy was a departure, that in departing from the early methods of our Government a fatal mistake was being made? Could any doubt have existed that the policy adopted by Congress in the series of measures to which I have referred would produce overgrown estates on the one hand and hopeless poverty and cheerless homes on the other, with masses of our people not able to keep the wolf from the door or to furnish shelter, food, and raiment for their wives and children? No, sir. The history of the human race rendered it absolutely certain that these results would follow. Who could have doubted that discontent would arise, the public peace be disturbed, and appeals to Congress for relief? Could any gentleman have doubted these would be the natural and legitimate results? They were foreseen as results likely to arise if we went back to the methods of monarchies as clearly by the prophetic eye of the early statesmen of this Republic as they are to-day. They sought to guard against such result, but our generation has failed in the high duty of its trust, and for temporary advantage and to promote favorite interests have sacrificed the grand hopes of the future.

You can not go out of the domain of the Government, you can not legislate in favor of special interests without building up fortunes of some and at the same time reducing fortunes of others. If you give great occasion, open up great opportunities, as have occurred in our generation, a few great estates, a great multitude of impoverished people are the inevitable results—great estates, and the land filled with the cry of labor struggling for relief. High taxation and subsidies to enrich special classes are alone responsible for all this.

Under the old benign policy of our fathers this Government at the end of the present century would have been in the vigor of youth, the general equality of its people in the main preserved. As it is now who can foretell what will be the condition of the American Republic at the end of the present century, with the changed condition of the people, the interest of labor oppressed by the overbearing temper of capital, with public discontent and the unrest of multitudes of our people furnishing a pretext for an increased army and an increased navy? Where are these things to end? I fear, as certain as cause follows effect, unless all this shall be changed and Congress shall undo as far as it can this un-American legislation in behalf of special interests, unless that remedy is applied, and applied speedily, our institutions will encounter grave peril.

Surely Congress will not go on adding to the elements of public insecurity.

Is this House prepared, therefore, in view of the recent experience we have had, to embark in these attempts at fostering the wealth of the few engaged in the ocean carrying trade at the expense of the whole people of the country? Are not the estates of some of the beneficiaries of this measure already too great for the public safety?

Sir, I hope that past experience will not be forgotten. I think this House at least should not forget the final result of the last subsidy grant made by this House on the ever specious pretense of reviving American shipping. I had occasion to remind the House once before that the most humiliating spectacle ever witnessed on this floor, and I trust in God it will not be repeated, was when men coming here with the respect and confidence of honorable constituencies left this Hall covered with shame and dishonor, never to return, and that, too, as the result of this policy now sought to be incorporated anew into our legislation, and as a natural outgrowth of a system of legislation in which the fortunes of the few by personal importunity are to be promoted at the expense of the many.

I think it is due to the people of this country, it is due to this House that the fact should be stated that one of the great corporations appealing to you for this subsidy came into your lobbies by its accredited agents with money in their hands to corrupt the legislation of Congress and by corrupt and dishonest means obtain money from your Treasury. In 1865 you had granted the Pacific Mail Steamship Company a subsidy of $500,000 a year for ten years. In 1872 you passed the law granting that powerful corporation a further subsidy of $500,000 a year for ten years, and two years later the fact came to light that bribery had secured the law and you promptly repealed it.

Gentlemen, here lies the great peril of this system of subsidies, this system of legislation that in its results inevitably makes a few rich and many poor. Bad enough that the policy of our period should be to disturb the natural equality in the material condition of our people by operation of law, building up great estates for the few and producing corresponding poverty in the many, because, independent of its injustice, it weakens the foundation of our Government; but how much less is that evil than that in our great Republic, in the opening of this our second century, a policy should be entered upon the natural fruits of which are to invite assaults upon the integrity and honor of the Congress of the United States and the agents of your Government. Can any man understand the extent to which the great subsidies already granted have affected your public men? How many public men have been brought into fearful and perilous temptations by motives unfriendly to the Government that employ them! That last experience in subsidy legislation is one I think that ought not to be forgotten. It is a humiliating lesson and ought not to be repeated, at least in our generation.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company is here the recipient of most of the subsidy proposed to be granted, a company which has already accumulated enormous wealth, not as the outgrowth of enterprise, frugality, or industry, but the outgrowth of your subsidy legislation; a wealth that has been created by laws at the expense of your people, which have changed the natural order of things, operating to the disadvantage of the multitude and to the advantage of the few.

This measure is in the main to still further enrich the enormous estates you have already created. I wish, sir, that a passage from a report made to this House, which I have marked, may be read from the Clerk's desk; and before it is read let me call the attention of the committee to a statement made by this same famous document to which I have alluded and which was laid upon all our desks to-day—this appeal of wealth for still greater estates. After referring to the fact that the previously small subsidies of 1857 were abandoned in 1859, the statement goes on:

> In 1870, by hard pluck, there was built 276,063 tons, and in 1874 a rally to 432,725 tons.
> Then again came a breaking of national faith by further Congressional abrogation of ocean mail contracts, and again the stabbing of our shipping in obedience to foreign whisperings, by way of punishing the individuals who had plundered the small profits saved. And thus, from short-sightedness, misrepresentation, and legislative bungling, in 1880 we built only 157,409 tons.

I ask your attention to the language "foreign whisperings," and in this connection I ask to have read the passage from the report to which

I have before alluded. Let us see if it is true, as intimated here more than once during this debate, that it was influences from abroad that were inducing members of Congress to refuse to promote the interest of their own shipping. Let us see whose "whisperings" suspended the subsidy of $500,000 a year granted to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company in 1872. Let us hear the report of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

The investigation of the Committee on Ways and Means was upon the question whether money had been corruptly used by said Pacific Mail Steamship Company or by any person to procure the passage by Congress of the act providing for the increased mail service.

The testimony shows that Arden B. Stockwell was, by a stock combination, elected president of the company in November, 1871, with a new board of directors. In December, 1871, he appears to have revived the purpose entertained by former officers of the company of obtaining an appropriation for additional service between San Francisco and China, and summoned Richard B. Irwin, one of the company's agents at San Francisco, to New York for consultation. Irwin accordingly came to New York in January, 1872, when he was told by Mr. Stockwell of his purpose to bring the matter again before Congress, and Stockwell arranged with him that he should proceed to Washington in charge of the efforts to procure the passage of such an act. This was done prior to my communication of his purpose to the board of directors or to the executive committee.

It also appears that on the 14th of February, 1872, at a meeting of the executive committee of the board of directors the following resolution was adopted by that committee, at the request of said Stockwell:

"February 14, 1872.

"Resolved, That the president, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to employ counsel and incur such other necessary expense as may be necessary in connection with the measures for additional subsidy now pending before Congress."

* * * * * * * *

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose checks to my order indorsed to your order for $230,000, $100,000, $110,000, and $40,000, which are placed in your hands to be used in payment of your service in case of the passage and approval by the President of the bill or amendment providing for the increase of our China mail service to semi-monthly trips with a subsidy of $500,000 a year for ten years, said compensation to be reduced pro rata in the event of a reduction of the amount appropriated as above. None of these checks to be used by you but all to be returned to me in the event of failure, excepting only the last-named ($40,000) all or any portion of which you may apply if actually required for your necessary expenses and for counsel fees.

Very respectfully yours,

A. B. STOCKWELL.

RICHARD B. IRWIN, Esq.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Stockwell was the president of the company.

The Clerk read as follows:

These were either the personal checks of Stockwell or checks belonging to him, not the checks of the company.

Irwin claimed that under the arrangement made by Mr. Stockwell with him, instead of the sum of $250,000 named in the preceding letter he was to have $500,000, and so stated to Stockwell in reply to that letter. To this communication of Irwin, Stockwell replied under date of May 4, 1872.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 3d to hand. We are much encouraged by the result of yesterday were it not for the demands of to-day. When we were defeated in the "House" you said to me there was some good to come of it; that if we did get our bill 'twould cost less. I don't think it wise for the company to give their checks in this matter. Notwithstanding, I now inclose the four checks for $100,000 each as you desire; but if they must be used, I would prefer my checks to be substituted for these; but, as I say above, I send them because I want to do everything to insure success. Of course you will return me my checks for $250,000 previously sent to you.

Yours, very respectfully,

A. B. STOCKWELL.

Mr. R. B. IRWIN.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the letter of the president of the board of directors of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, the president of the very company which has been appealing to you by a paper laid on your desks this morning denying that any improper influences are in use to secure the passage of this amendment appropriating this subsidy of $800,000—the same company which, according to the report in the hands of the Clerk at your desk, expended $900,000 to corrupt Congress. The following words in the conclusion of the report made to the House on the 20th day of February, 1873, only thirteen years ago, by the Committee of Ways and Means, show the extent by this extraordinary expenditure of this corporation to influence the action of Congress.

The results of the evidence are that about $900,000 was disbursed upon the allegation that it was used in aid of the passage of the act now under investigation.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What was the date of that?

Mr. HOLMAN. It was February 20, 1873. The company which expended that $900,000 and carried, on the 2d of June, 1872, that subsidy of $500,000 for ten years through, that same company now comes before you and tells you that no improper influences are being used to secure the pending subsidy. I do not believe that corrupt corporation can reach any member of this House. I hasten indeed to say that I do not believe that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company could by all of its enormous wealth, the foundation of which was laid by a Congressional subsidy, reach any member of this House.

But the fact that it has done so in former years, that it spent its corrupting money to dishonor Congress and our country—for that very letter shows that the president of the company regarded Congress as in the market and legislation as something to be bought, is too manifest to be called in question—makes me shudder at the thought that the same powerful corporation can again appear by its agents in your lobbies demanding a gratuity out of the hard earnings of our people hoarded in your Treasury. This very corporation is a direct outgrowth of your subsidy system in the grant of bonds and lands you made to the Union Pacific Railway Company, in which you created private fortunes almost unexampled in the history of mankind.

But, gentlemen, have you considered that in connection with this question of subsidy the question of taxation necessarily connected with it is of the highest moment. The current expenses of this Government confined to the simple objects and just purposes of Government would be enormously below the present rate of expenditure. Direct subsidy in various forms has swollen the expenditure to the present enormous proportions. Have you considered, gentlemen, that taxation itself is one of the most powerful centralizers of wealth ever devised by men who wish to live off of the labor of other men? You draw from the labor of the people annually $325,000,000, a sum more than equal to one-fifth of the entire currency of the country. You know that at least a part of this $325,000,000—this enormous wealth—is annually crystallized into more than comfortable estates and in instances into great fortunes somewhere. It never goes back to the great mass of our people who pay it into the Treasury through the countless channels of customs, taxes, and internal-revenue taxation. It never goes back to them. This $325,000,000 is an enormous body of wealth drawn annually from the industries of the people. Its exactions are felt in every home and at every fireside in the crimping of the comforts of home, shelter, and food. It is drawn from the whole people, and yet less than half a million, perhaps a greatly less number of our people, receive back any portion of this vast sum of money in any shape or form, and yet this goes on every year. With a taxation on labor unexampled in a time of peace, with a consciousness that our wealth in lands has been substantially exhausted by imperial grants to the favorites of Congress, that the enormous body of wealth, near $100,000,000, has been given directly to the gentlemen who have ingeniously managed the Union Pacific Railway system and unnumbered other subsidies, is it surprising that at this early moment Congress is appealed to for relief; that bills are pending to repeal the enormous land grants so far as it can be done; that efforts are made to compel the Union Pacific to disgorge the sums of money it has dishonestly withheld; that unrest and discontent fill the land with disorder? No, sir; this is the natural result of subsidy.

I admit again that the last twenty-six years have witnessed an unexampled growth of the wealth of this country, but the form of its development has thrown us back to the wretched social system of the Old World, from which our fathers thought they had forever escaped. Palaces and huts, the luxury and arrogance of wealth, the wretchedness of poverty! English, Scotch, and German landlordism in America with great landed estates and impoverished and dependent American tenants! Such are the fruits of subsidy. Such was the result of subsidy in the Old World in giving strength to monarchy by the centralization of wealth. Such is, has been, and will be in the New, and such are its results in our country up to this hour. Subsidy in the nature of things centralizes wealth. The strength of monarchy is in centralized wealth; the strength of a republic is in the diffusion of the wealth of the nation among the whole people, and yet men of ample fortunes are here demanding subsidies from your Treasury!

I protest against this presumption of wealth. I protest against a system of legislation which imperils the integrity of Congress and invites unlawful and corrupt agencies. I protest against legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of labor. I protest against this whole system of subsidy, which in all ages has only created great estates and filled the land with poverty. And I plead for that earlier and better system which secured to all men the equal protection of law and equal and exact justice to all, "protecting all, granting favors to none."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say that I shall press as rapidly as I can to-morrow the consideration of these amendments.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who desire to do so may have leave to print their remarks on these amendments in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 79) for the relief of William L. Dunlap, trustee.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], who was not present when the Committee on Naval Affairs was called, desires to present a report.

There was no objection.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back the joint resolution (H. Res. 54) to credit Lieuts. Giles B. Harber and William H. Schuetze with sea-duty and sea-pay while engaged in the search for Lieutenant Chipp and party, and also for the time employed in bringing home the remains of Lieutenant-Commander De Long and party; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 20, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COKE. When in the consideration of the pension bill passed yesterday the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war was voted on, that is, when the motion to lay the amendment on the table was voted on, I was absent from the Senate, at the Commerce Committee room with other members of that committee at work on the river and harbor bill, by permission of the Senate. I am marked in the RECORD as an absentee, when in fact I was paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. Had I been present, I would have voted against laying the amendment on the table. I desire that fact to appear of record.

I desire to state further that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY], who was also absent on official business, who is marked here as an absentee and who has no pair announced on this vote, was paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]. If my colleague had been here, he would have voted as I would have done, against the motion to table the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that both pairs were announced.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a letter from the governor of Ohio, transmitting a copy of the resolutions of the house of representatives of Ohio in respect to the election of Hon. HENRY B. PAYNE a Senator from that State; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VEST presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of the bill imposing a tax on oleomargarine and butterine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of citizens of Wilton, Fairfield County, Connecticut, praying for the passage of a bill providing that imitation butter shall be sold under its true name; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of ex-prisoners of war, citizens of Hartford, Conn., praying for the passage of the bill pending in the House of Representatives to pension ex-prisoners of war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN. I present the report of the grand jury of the United States court in Savannah, made to the court at the termination of their labors, in which they call attention to the condition of the present court-house. It is located upon the most important business street in the city, which is paved with cobble-stone, and the numerous wagons and carriages and vehicles of all sorts which pass over it, as the grand jury state and as the judge states in a letter accompanying the presentment, make it almost impossible many times (and I know from having once practiced in the court there that it is true) to hear either the witnesses or the remarks of counsel. The House of Representatives having passed a bill making an appropriation for a new building at that place, this is intended as an expression of the grand jury, indorsed by the judge, as to the great necessity for the passage of the bill. I move the reference of the papers to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of T. R. Foster and 25 other citizens of Berlin, Vt., and some other towns, praying for legislation to repress the manufacture and sale of fraudulent butter. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of Albert D. Spalter, of Rumney Depot, N. H., in which he prays for remuneration on account of services rendered the Government by his maternal grandfather, Lieut. Moses Child, during the French and Indian and Revolutionary wars. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of Charles B. Pendleton, a senator from the twenty-fourth senatorial district of Florida, and F. Figueredo, a member of the assembly of Florida, in which they assert that Mr. Cirilo Pouble, formerly a resident of Key West and more lately of New York, and to them well known, was arrested in the city of Havana, Cuba, in December, 1884, and since then has been confined in prison by the Spanish authorities of that island for some so-called political offense.

They further show that Mr. Civile Pouble in May of 1882 declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, which is a matter of record in the clerk's office at Key West, and which has been examined and attested by them.

They further show that Mr. Pouble is held for publications which were made in this country, and while a resident of it, and if an offense was there committed he is amenable to our laws. In the cause of humanity, common justice, and the honor of our country they respectfully ask that his immediate release and return to this country be demanded, and pray for such other action as may best comport with the dignity of this country.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the request that it may have immediate consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5401) making appropriations for additional barracks at the Southern, Northwestern, and Western branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2427) for the relief of the legal representatives of Eliza M. Ferris;

A bill (H. R. 6248) granting a pension to Louis A. Wollenweber;

A bill (H. R. 7437) to increase the pension of Levi L. Tongue;

A bill (H. R. 7407) granting a pension to Cyrus Dubbs;

A bill (H. R. 7688) granting a pension to Wilhelm Nolte;

A bill (H. R. 7843) granting a pension to Edwin R. Parks;

A bill (H. R. 7299) for the relief of Green Chambers;

A bill (H. R. 7401) granting a pension to Samuel Miller; and

A bill (H. R. 6895) granting a pension to Sarah Harbaugh.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5154) granting a pension to Margaret A. Poland, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, in favor of the appointment of a fourth United States judge and an increase of compensation to judges, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the prayer of the petitioners be denied; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2281) granting to railroads the right of way through the Indian reservation in Northern Montana, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1799) for the removal of the Eastern Cherokee Indians to the Indian Territory, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2377) to authorize the United States district court for the northern district of California to proceed in the case of the executors and heirs of Augustine de Yturbide, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

CHEYENNE AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2222) to authorize the Cheyenne and Northern Railway Company to build its road across the Fort Russell and Fort Laramie military reservations, to report it favorably with amendments.

I will say that this bill has not only the unanimous approval of the committee but also the approval of the Secretary of War, and as the road is to be constructed this year, I ask that the bill be now considered. I do not think there can be any possible objection to it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. There are two amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7, after the word "line," the committee report to insert the words "and subject to such regulations;" so as to read:

That the Cheyenne and Northern Railway Company, a corporation created and organized under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming, is hereby authorized to build its road across the Fort Russell and Fort Laramie military reservations, upon such a line and subject to such regulations as may be approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was to add to the bill:

And shall be subject to such change or removal as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that the amendment should be amended by adding "at the expense of the railway company."

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to that amendment. I adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, that any change ordered by the Secretary of War shall be made at the expense of the railway company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment "at the expense of the railway company;" so as to read:

Provided, That such right of way shall not exceed 100 feet in width, and shall be subject to such change or removal as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, at the expense of the railway company.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us hear the bill as amended read. It is very short.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Cheyenne and Northern Railway Company, a corporation created and organized under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming, is hereby authorized to build its road across the Fort Russell and Fort Laramie military reservations, upon such a line and subject to such restrictions as may be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That such right of way shall not exceed 100 feet in width, and shall be subject to such change or removal as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, at the expense of the railway company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to add what I am sure there will be no objection to, that which ought to be added in all these granting bills:

That if the rights hereby conferred shall not be exercised and the road built within three years next after the passage of this act, all the rights and authority hereby granted shall absolutely cease and determine.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have certainly no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought to have that in every one of these bills.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is a railroad bill, and I have guarded it very carefully with all the restrictions possible, and certainly I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. 2. That if the rights hereby conferred shall not be exercised and the road built within three years next after the passage of this act, all the rights and authority hereby granted shall absolutely cease and determine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 570) for the relief of E. P. Thompson;

A bill (H. R. 6391) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7207) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1886, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at South Pass of Mississippi River; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 79) for the relief of William L. Dunlop, trustee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2482) to restore pensions in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 2483) to grant to the trustees of the German Lutheran Trinity congregation, of Washington, D. C., the right to sell a portion of their cemetery lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS introduced a bill (S. 2484) appropriating $25,000 in aid of a volunteer disabled soldiers' home in Vermont; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the bill be read the second time and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which I suppose is the proper committee, and I hope that committee will give it early attention.

The bill was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MCPHERSON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2485) granting a pension to Robert Boyd;

A bill (S. 2486) granting a pension to John Spruce;

A bill (S. 2487) granting a pension to Andrew Mucklin; and

A bill (S. 2488) granting a pension to John B. Fuller.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2489) for the relief of Thomas Gehagan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2490) granting an increase of pension to George H. Bethord; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2491) granting a pension to George W. Schell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2492) granting a pension to Samuel Wilson, father of Samuel Wilson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2493) granting a pension to John Harris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2494) granting a pension to Nelson Mason; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2495) granting a pension to William Demoss; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 65) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Carlos H. L. Morsing, of Brazil, South America; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. MCPHERSON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them severally to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

ARKANSAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I wish to ask the unanimous leave of the Senate to take up a bill of local importance in my State. It simply transfers three counties from the Federal judicial district in which I live to another Federal judicial district to save the inconvenience of parties litigant and witnesses traveling 160 or 200 miles farther than it is necessary to travel. The bill will not require the attention of the Senate above two or three minutes. It is Calender No. 1143, House bill 5910.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5910) to detach the counties of Howard, Little River, and Sevier from the western and add them to the eastern district of Arkansas. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Since the bill was reported it has occurred to the committee that an amendment will be necessary to it so far as pending causes are concerned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And crimes.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; old offenses. I ask the Chief Clerk to report the amendment which I have previously submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not with the bill at the desk.

Mr. INGALLS. I gave the clerks a paper which was to be filed with the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Has not the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] the exact language in another bill relating to the districts in his State?

Mr. WALTHALL. Yes; the amendment with reference to old offenses.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I send the amendment which the Senator from Mississippi has in his possession to the desk.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

And all prosecutions for crimes and offenses heretofore committed against the United States shall be commenced and prosecuted as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It should read "commenced, prosecuted, and determined." Put in the words "and determined."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And all prosecutions for crimes and offenses heretofore committed against the United States shall be commenced, prosecuted, and determined as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not do. It should be confined to crimes and offenses committed in the three counties named. As it is now it is altogether too large.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Yes; it should apply to the three counties of Howard, Little River, and Sevier.

Mr. INGALLS. I prepared an amendment and gave it to the clerks to file with the bill, and it should appear somewhere among the papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment does not seem to be among the papers now. If the bill lies over temporarily the clerks will probably find it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can fix it in a moment.

Mr. CONGER. If this bill is laid over temporarily I ask, what I have been struggling for some weeks to get, consent to consider a bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Michigan suspend for a moment until we can finish the bill of my friend from Arkansas? I have an amendment now prepared which I think will answer the purpose. I move to amend the bill by adding after section 2, as section 3, and so changing the number of the last section:

SEC. 3. All crimes and offenses heretofore committed within said western district shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

I think that will do.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE BARGE MICHIGAN.

Mr. CONGER. I now ask the consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4968) to authorize and direct the registry and enrollment of the barge Michigan, of Alpena, Mich.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I move that Order of Business 1096, being the bill

(S. 2066) touching the grade of commander in the Navy, and to correct an error in relation to an appointment therein, be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I have the consent of the Senator who reported the bill adversely [Mr. BUTLER] to move its recommittal.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will now be proceeded with. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. 121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road, on which the Senator frem New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] has the floor.

Mr. WALTHALL. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me to call up a local bill, which can be disposed of without debate?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should be very glad to yield, but I do not know that I have any right to yield the floor on a bill which is in charge of another Senator.

Mr. WALTHALL. If the Senator will yield it will take no time. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2152) to amend chapter 218 of the acts of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, approved June 15, 1882.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to add to the bill:

And all prosecutions for crimes and offenses heretofore committed against the United States shall be commenced and prosecuted as if this act had not been passed.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the county of Attala, in the northern judicial district of the State of Mississippi, is hereby transferred from the western to the eastern division of said district; and all prosecutions for crimes and offenses heretofore committed against the United States shall be commenced and prosecuted as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not correct in form, and I move, if there be no objection, to insert in lieu of that amendment precisely the words which we have inserted in the Arkansas bill, which I am sure will cover it.

Mr. WALTHALL. I will state to the Senator that the amendment just reported was made to the bill by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but unhappily, by some accident in transcribing, it is not in the form which was agreed upon in the committee.

Mr. WALTHALL. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont will be acceptable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment as reported from the Committee on the Judiciary will be withdrawn and the amendment as heretofore proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And all crimes and offenses heretofore committed within said western division of said northern district shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEN ISLAND BRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill on the Calendar will now be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MCPHERSON as a substitute.

Mr. MCPHERSON. When I yielded the floor yesterday I was proceeding to speak of the policy which had been pursued touching the proposed construction of a bridge across the Detroit River. It will be remembered that certain officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, as in the present case, had reported favorably upon the practicability of bridging that stream consistently with the interests of navigation. It will be further remembered that in this case but one engineer officer has made such a report. In the case of the Detroit River bridge I think there had been three distinct and separate reports favoring the construction of a bridge. This would probably have been done, and the immense commerce of that great water way would have been permanently impaired, had it not been for the timely action of Congress, as found in the appropriation bill for rivers and harbors, approved March 3, 1873, in which a provision was inserted, which reads as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and required to detail from the Engineer Corps one or more engineers, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and report upon the practicability of bridging, consistently with the interests of navigation, the channel between Lake Huron and Lake Erie, at such points as may be needful for the passing of railroad trains across said channel, and also its effect upon the navigation of the same; and further, to inquire into the number and character of the vessels navigating said channel, and the number of trips made by each, and, if said bridging be practicable, to report what extent of span or spans and elevation above the water will be required in the construction of such bridge or bridges, so as not seriously to injure the navigation of said channel.

I send to the desk of the Secretary, and ask to have read, a small part of that report, which will be found on page 599 of the report of the engineers for the year 1874, included within the lines I have marked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The different railway crossings of the river have now been considered. Two bridges only are at present desired, namely, at Detroit and at Stony Island. As the road crossing at the latter point has but just been opened, we have no data for the amount of freight it will take over. From Messrs. Bissell and Hackett's statement, the amount of freight which would pass through a bridge at Detroit is about 9,000,000 of tons per annum, while from the Great Western Railway Company's statement the whole amount of freight crossed at Detroit in 1872 was less than one-tenth that amount. But what makes a bridge necessary to the railroads is the winter ice, as during the summer freight can be crossed about as cheaply by ferry as by a bridge, when interest on the cost of the latter and maintenance are considered.

Hence, supposing one-third of the railway freight to be crossed during the winter months, it will be seen, in the case of a bridge, that 9,000,000 of tons of freight is asked to yield its interests for the benefit of one-thirtieth of that amount. This ratio will become larger when the Canada Southern road is in full operation, but it must always be small.

But, aside from the relative amounts of freight whose interests are in opposition, there is a wide difference between the rates of transportation between points connected both by water and by rail.

From Chicago to Buffalo, during the season of navigation, there is the freest competition. The vessels engaged in freighting are of the most varied kind, their owners and managers are widely scattered, and almost as numerous as the vessels; and, when the rates of freight become high enough to make carrying a little more profitable, any man with a few thousand dollars can build a vessel and compete with the others.

A combination of any serious extent and long continuation becomes then impossible.

Among the railroad lines between Chicago and Buffalo, which are few in number, combinations to fix the rates of freight are easily formed. If the rates are too high, the fact that, to enter into competition with these, a capital of many millions of dollars is required, practically destroys such competition as would fix and keep the rates at the lowest practicable point.

The results of unlimited competition and water transportation on one hand, and of no competition and rail transportation on the other, are shown in the rates on grain from Chicago to Buffalo by water, in 1872, which varied, according to Messrs. Bissell and Hackett's statement, from 1.66 mills per ton per mile to 3.53 mills per ton per mile: averaging 2.74 mills, or about 12 cents per hundred pounds from Chicago to Buffalo, while the rail rates by Blue Line were in October, 1872, 35 cents, and in May and September, 1873, 30 cents. In 1871 these rates varied from 22½ cents in summer to 35 cents in winter.

The earnings on through freight of the Michigan Central Railroad are given in Table XVII, and in 1872 they average 12.80 mills per ton per mile.

The most pressing want of the whole Northwest is cheap transportation to the East, and no steps should be taken which can interfere with the main channel by which that transportation is secured. If we consider the magnitude of the freights which pass through the Detroit River as compared with those which in winter need a bridge to cross it, or if we compare the rates by which freight is carried between points like Chicago and Buffalo, common to the two routes, the immense importance of the preservation of the water way unimpaired stands clearly forth. Bridges would be of an additional value to the railroads on account of the quicker time its passengers could make. This consideration is, however, of minor importance to the country at large, and especially to the Northwest, which demands, not the quickest passenger transit to New York across the Detroit River, but the cheapest frieghts on grain.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I need not detail to the Senate the imperative necessity which seemed to exist to accommodate the great railroad lines engaged in interstate commerce, and the great expense entailed on said lines, especially during the winter season, in crossing freight and passengers. The cost during ice season was estimated as high as 20 cents per ton on freight by some of the railroad managers. Notwithstanding this obstruction to the railroads during the winter season the Secretary of War, wisely and prudently, appointed a board of engineers, five in number, to carry into effect the provisions of act of March 3, 1873. And notwithstanding the railroad companies proposed to compromise upon a bridge which would be available for their use four months in the year, and whose use would be denied them during the navigation season, or eight months in the year, the able board of officers to whom it was referred reported against a bridge and in favor of a tunnel.

I will now read the conclusions of the board, which will be found on page 603 of the same volume.

Second. That no bridge giving passage to vessels, by draws alone, with draw-spans at present practicable, can be permitted without serious injury to navigation.

* * * * * * *

Fourth. For the reasons heretofore given, although the question has not been directly referred to it, the board deem the crossing of the river by tunnels the only unobjectionable method; and from all the information they have obtained, think a tunnel at Detroit or Stony Island is by no means impracticable, at a cost not so great as to debar its construction.

The bridge was denied and a tunnel was recommended; a tunnel was commenced to be built, but they have not proceeded to the extent of completing it.

I only cite this case to show that after three engineer officers of like rank with Major Gillespie had reported in favor of bridging the Detroit River, the Secretary of War under an act of Congress appointed a board of engineers of the most competent men in the Engineer Corps of the Army, and they decided against the construction of a bridge across that river for the reasons so very elaborately stated which appear in the report.

Again, Mr. President, the act of June 23, 1866, making appropriations for rivers and harbors contained the following section:

For examining and reporting upon the subject of constructing railroad bridges across the Mississippi River between Saint Paul, in Minnesota, and Saint Louis, in Missouri, upon such plans as will offer the least impediment to the navigation of the river.

The Secretary of War organized a board of engineers under that distinguished engineer officer General Warren. They examined into all of the proposed bridges, built and to be built, to wit, at Quincy, at Dubuque, at Saint Paul, at Hastings, at Winona, at La Crosse, at Prairie du Chien, at Clinton, the new Rock Island bridge, and the Burlington railway bridge, the Hannibal railway bridge, and the Louisiana railway bridge.

The board makes very elaborate reports in each case, which I commend to the consideration of the Senate, but will not take the time of the Senate to read. I will, however, read a few words from the general conclusions reached by the board as found on page 15, report of 1878, which reads as follows:

Not counting draw-bridges authorized but not built, those now in existence have more than reached the limits of aggregate obstruction to navigation that can be borne without suffering great loss. Such bridges "accommodate" the railroads, but the delays they occasion to vessels at nights and during winds which do not interfere with the navigation of other parts of the river, prevent all regularity in the running of steamboats, and destroy the systematic arrangements for loading and unloading freights, upon which economical and profitable management depends.

* * * * * * *

The conclusion then (which the whole of this investigation and report sustains) is, that high bridges with wide spans are the only kind that will with certainty "accommodate the railroads, and at the same time preserve the navigation."

Now, Mr. President, the reports that I have read impel me to the conclusion that the Senate can not with safety to all interests concerned, and especially to the great interests of navigation on this stream, consent that it be bridged as provided in this bill. A tunnel may be built at very little cost and under more favorable conditions as to approaches, depth, and foundation of the stream than can be found elsewhere in the world. If a tunnel were properly constructed the passage of the trains could not interfere with the commerce of the stream, nor could the commerce of the stream interfere with or delay the passage of the trains. For myself, I am not willing to sacrifice this great public interest at the demand of a single railroad or any number of railroads.

I will not take the time of the Senate longer, Mr. President, having only referred to one or two authorities, although I have many that I should like to submit.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, this bill being practically in my charge, it was my intention to have closed the debate; but as I leave to-morrow morning that will be impossible, and therefore I will take no part in the discussion. I leave the questions of law and of fact fortunately in abler hands than mine anyway. I desire to say simply a word now.

Allusion has been made to two railroad companies, the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio, and their conflicting interests. I was appointed chairman of a subcommittee to consider this question about three years ago, and I am frank to say that my predilections were all for the Pennsylvania Railroad and are to-day as against the Baltimore and Ohio. I am free further to say that all my sympathies were with New Jersey as against New York, New Jersey being the smaller State, and I living in a small State. Therefore I started into this investigation with a desire to be able to satisfy myself that this bridge ought not to be built—an honest desire on my part to so find.

We gave at least at that time two days' hearing, and some of the ablest lawyers in this country appeared for both sides. The Senators from New Jersey appeared in behalf of one side.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I did not.

Mr. FRYE. You did not. The members of the House appeared on both sides. Fortunately nearly the whole of the members of the Committee on Commerce were present at these hearings, as it was a matter of a good deal of interest and attracted attention, and the hearings were of great interest on account of the distinguished character of the gentlemen who appeared to represent the two sides. We listened patiently and heard all the testimony in the case and reported unanimously, I being compelled to yield my predilections and my sympathies, in favor of building this bridge and building it 30 feet high above mean low water.

The bill was not acted upon. It was again presented at this session of Congress, and again the gentlemen on both sides demanded a hearing, and again the whole committee gave them a hearing that lasted, according to my recollection, three days. The investigation and the arguments were more exhaustive than they were before, and in the trial of this case there was nothing left out of evidence or of law, and when the hearing was over the Committee on Commerce, with the same unanimity as before, gave a verdict in favor of building this bridge, only amending the former bill by increasing the height 2 feet, and as the former bill limited the Secretary of War to the location at a particular point which was objectionable to many of the gentlemen who appeared against the bridge on account of a current and a curve in the stream there but which the railroad preferred on account of its being a shorter distance across, an amendment was agreed to giving more latitude to the Secretary of War as to location. I say the committee was practically unanimous on that, and after a full hearing, a great deal fuller and ampler hearing than can be had here in the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I myself have no question about the propriety of building this bridge. In my judgment the general commerce of the country demands it. That it will interfere to a certain extent with the commerce of the Arthur Kill of course can not be doubted, and no bridge can be built on any river where there is much commerce that does not to a certain extent interfere with that commerce; and yet the interference with that commerce is amply answered for by the benefits that will be derived by the general commerce of the country.

As to the height of the bridge, it has been suggested that it ought to be 70 feet. I disagree to that suggestion. I fail to see why 70 feet would be any better than 32 feet. There is no schooner or barge that can not go under a 22-foot bridge, and there is no tug or canal-boat or barge, in my opinion from the evidence offered, that will not go under the 32-foot bridge. All tugs that are constructed nowadays that would not go under a 32-foot bridge can very easily, and at a very little expense, be so contrived that the smoke-stacks can be lowered; and on the Western rivers and in other localities very many of them are so contrived. It is very seldom that a sailing vessel goes through this Kill. There is no necessity for it. The commerce of the Kill consists of canal-boats, tug-boats, barges. According to the evidence, ninety-one one-hundredths of all the commerce that goes through it is of that character.

There is within my knowledge but one bridge in this whole neighborhood of New York and New Jersey higher than a 32 feet bridge, and that is the Brooklyn bridge. I do not know of any other. There certainly is not one in New Jersey. A large amount of the commerce which comes through this Kill comes down the Raritan River and under a bridge there which is not 32 feet high. There is not one higher in New England that I know of. The draw provided for is 200 feet in the clear. I do not believe that that draw will have to be opened four times a day to accommodate all the commerce of the Arthur Kill with a bridge 32 feet high.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say.. In my judgment the interests of the commerce of this country, not of New England, because I do not think New England commerce will be benefited in the slightest by this bridge, but the commerce of the great West will be immensely accommodated by this bridge.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to a part of the report? Major Gillespie, upon whom I think the committee very largely rely seemingly, as they quote him in the formal report they make to the Senate, speaking of the bridges about New York and New Jersey, as found on page 743 of the report of the Secretary of War in 1884, says of Arthur Kill:

This is one of the most important highways for commerce in the vicinity of New York Harbor.

The channel is used by all the vessels which transport the commerce originating at Elizabethport, and also by all the vessels, steamers, boats, barges, and tows which go to the several rivers tributary to Anthur Kill, or which pass from New York Harbor southward through the Delaware and Raritan Canal.

The annual tonnage of the canal alone at one time reached the high figure of 5,500,000 tons.

It is now greatly diminished; he proceeds to state why. It will be remembered that the Raritan River is only a tributary of this sound. Across the mouth of that river was built a bridge of exactly the character which the Senator proposes to build across the main channel of Arthur Kill. As a consequence of the building of that bridge across the mouth of the Raritan River, according to the statement of Major Gillespie himself, the commerce has diminished from 5,500,000 tons to 2,300,000 tons. And yet he does not think this proposed bridge will interfere with the commerce of the sound.

Mr. FRYE. I did not say so. I said I thought it would.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Major Gillespie goes on to say:

The tonnage of coal, iron, and other freight from Elizabethport is about 3,000,000 annually, and the total tonnage through the channel is estimated at 16,500,000 tons annually, with an estimated value of $61,592,000.

The maintenance of deep water in this channel is a matter of more than local importance, and concerns not only the entire coasting trade of New Jersey, but also a considerable part of that of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland.

Especially is it a great outlet for easy and economical delivery to the manufactories of the New England States.

In that regard it does interest the Senator's constituents.

Especial attention is invited——

Mr. FRYE. The Senator will pardon me again. I said that New England had not any special interest in favor of this bridge.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I so understand him.

Mr. FRYE. It is the opposite of what the Senator has attributed to me.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I have noticed in the Senator's report, which I have read with a great deal of care, a statement as to the amount of tonnage passing through this stream upon which he expects to construct a bridge only 32 feet high. He speaks of the tonnage of Perth Amboy, South Amboy, and the Delaware and Raritan Canal. He quotes from Major Gillespie's report and Major Gillespie is exactly right as to the amount of tonnage from the three given points.

Major Gillespie, for some reason unexplained, whether intentionally or unintentionally, has deceived the committee and the public as to the amount of tonnage necessarily passing through the Arthur Kill. He speaks of three points which are great delivery points and there stops. Now, what are the facts? In addition to the tonnage that must necessarily pass through this stream of which Major Gillespie speaks, here is Cheesequake Creek, which has been improved by the Government, and according to his own report there are 47,000 tons from that not named in his report; there is Rahway River, 50,000 tons; Elizabeth River, 30,000 tons; Woodbridge Creek, 120,000 tons annually; Matteawan Creek, 122,000 tons; and there is Keyport Harbor; its commerce must take this route in times of storm on the Atlantic, and the entire commerce of Keyport Harbor is 1,800,000 tons. Then there is South River, of which he does not speak at all, 350,000 tons; and the factories located along the Arthur Kill, 100,000 tons more.

Let me ask the Senator from Maine just one simple question. Under this bill this can not be in the special interest of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad alone, because you propose to give all other railroads the same advantages; and that I claim will be worse than giving them to the Baltimore and Ohio alone, because it will only multiply the trains on the bridge and more seriously impede navigation because of the number of trains. Then what is the objection, what can be the objecjection to the construction of a tunnel instead of a bridge, when the tunnel can be cheaply built, and when the tunnel is built no passing vessel can interfere with a passing train and no passing train with a passing vessel?

Here is an island said to be important for the great commercial interests of the country, conceded to be so, and therefore it is that you should be extremely careful how you propose to reach that island. Let it be done in a substantial manner, in a wise and prudent manner. It is only a matter of a few thousand dollars one way or the other, and as I said yesterday when addressing the Senate it would be better for the people of New Jersey to build the tunnel, construct it at their own expense, and make it a present to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and all other railroads that desire to use it, than to endure this proposed bridge.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I was not aware that I had said anything to provoke the Senator from New Jersey into making another speech. I said nothing about the extent of commerce on this stream at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator quoted Major Gillespie's report as to the amount of commerce.

Mr. FRYE. In my speech I said nothing about the amount of commerce.

Mr. McPHERSON. I spoke of your report.

Mr. FRYE. My report correctly stated the commerce.

Mr. McPHERSON. It stated the commerce at three points. I say that in the general estimate there are 3,582,000 tons of freight passing through there that are not stated in the report.

Mr. FRYE. I simply desire to restate what I did say, that before the Committee on Commerce all the facts appeared. The distinguished gentlemen who argued the case besides the Senator from New Jersey did not leave out anything of law or of fact. Everything was put in. I never knew a case in my experience more carefully prepared and more thoroughly treated than this case; and yet I say that the committee were compelled to come to the conclusion that the general interests of commerce demanded that the bridge should be built. That is all I said about it. I am not belittling the commerce of Arthur Kill. I know it is immense, and that is all I intended to say about it.

Now only one word further in regard to Major Gillespie. So strongly was my mind inclined for New Jersey and for the Pennsylvania Railroad as against the Baltimore and Ohio—I mean personally—that after we had had one hearing and the report of Engineer Gillespie had been read the Senator from New Jersey asked me if I would not have that report recommitted with a request that an examination be made. I recommitted that report to the Secretary of War with an invitation as strong as one could make it in a letter of that kind, that he not only would re-examine, but that he would reform his report so that it might be nearer my views and my wishes; but instead of reforming he examined again, and the report came back stronger than it was before.

That is all I desire to say. I do not intend to discuss the general merits of the question at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, in all the cases to which I referred this morning like favorable reports had been made by individual engineers, and those reports and recommendations when referred to a board of engineers were overruled. I am quite certain that if this matter were recommitted to a board of intelligent engineers not one of them would report favorably to the construction of a bridge across this water way, except it be a high bridge with a wide span.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, in several years' service upon the Committee on Commerce I do not now remember a single case where a bridge was proposed to be constructed over a navigable stream where there was any considerable amount of commerce without a direct conflict between what is called the river interest or the navigation interest and the railroad companies. The great difficulty in which our committee has always been has been to strike the just medium between these two conflicting interests. The river men, the navigation men seem to be unable to see that there is a vast change in the carrying trade which has taken place all over this continent. Where there used to be hundreds of vessels navigating streams, the railroads have almost destroyed the navigation interest.

Conspicuously is this so in cases like the one now under consideration before the Senate. The natural antagonism, if I may so term it, between the railroads and the navigation interest, the vessels of the country, has been sadly enhanced in this case by the struggle between two giant corporations, the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Companies. The Pennsylvania Railroad, I speak of it in the most disinterested way; I have no connection with either company and but a very slight acquaintance with the officers of either; I have no favors to ask from them and have never received any. My only interest in this matter is as a Senator from a Western State, every producer in which is directly interested in cheap transportation, whether by water or by rail, and I have endeavored to perform my duty judicially in this whole matter and have listened to the arguments that have been made on each side. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company wants to keep the Baltimore and Ohio from coming into New York city, because that enhances and increases its own profits. It is the old story. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has made this struggle upon the basis ostensibly of what, as I said before, is now the rather inconsiderable navigation interest, because as compared with the interests of these two gigantic corporations the navigation is inconsiderable, though it amounts here to a great deal.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask whether there is not some way of adjusting these interests so that the navigation which now exists shall not be imperiled for the benefit of interests hereafter to arise.

Mr. VEST. That is exactly the object and aim of the Commerce Committee, and has been in all these cases, and is in the case now before the Senate. If we can give to this railroad the right to cross Arthur Kill and give it direct communication with or entrance into New York city without injuring the navigation interest, we want to do it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Suppose another great railroad interest and a second and a third shall in the immediate future seek an outlet across New Jersey and to the terminal facilities found there, and shall also desire to build a railroad bridge. Suppose the applications multiply indefinitely. This will be accepted and taken as a precedent and rule for future action by Congress, and it is absolutely and emphatically proven that this bridge alone will not only impair but destroy the commerce, what will it be when there are half a dozen others, with differing train hours? How long does the Senator think, under such circumstances, it would require for a tow to pass through all the bridges? In short, would not all commerce on the sound be of necessity abandoned?

Mr. VEST. That is the side of the case entirely opposed to the construction of any bridge across the Arthur Kill. Does the Senator mean to say that we are to construct no bridge at all? He says this will be a precedent. In so far as it is the construction of a bridge in the interest of cheap transportation, and which does not unjustly affect the navigation interests, it is a good precedent, and the bridge ought to be built whether it goes over one navigable stream or another. When it comes now to the reductio ad absurdum put here by the Senator from New Jersey, that if we pass this bill we shall multiply the number of bridges across the Arthur Kill, I say that is no argument at all, because that is taking for nothing the legislative discretion of the Committee on Commerce and of the Senate and of the Congress. All these matters are to be determined as each case is specifically presented.

When the Eads bridge was built at Saint Louis, the most splendid structure of the kind at that time upon this continent if not in the world, I remember, and every Senator here will remember, the attack made upon it by all the steamboat interests of the Mississippi River. It was predicted that the river would be obstructed by the wrecks that would be caused against the piers of that bridge; yet the bridge stands there to-day without those wrecks; and now when another bridge is proposed across the Mississippi River and in every such instance these same interests, no doubt looking alone to their immediate personal benefit, declare that if another bridge is put over the stream it will destroy navigation entirely.

Mr. SEWELL. May I ask the Senator what is the height of that bridge?

Mr. VEST. Fifty feet, a fixed bridge with fixed spans, and not a draw-bridge.

Mr. McPHERSON. Above high water?

Mr. SEWELL. Sufficient to pass everything on the Mississippi River.

Mr. VEST. Boatmen said not. They complained that it would be impossible for the larger class of boats on the Upper Mississippi to go below the bridge; and yet all these difficulties have disappeared. The engineers of the United States held a convention at Saint Louis and declared that the bridge was utterly impracticable, that a 500 feet span was absolutely impossible, and they stopped the construction of it for eighteen months; yet Eads went on and built the bridge, and, so far as can be seen now, it will stand as long as the banks on each side of the river stand.

Mr. President, I approached the question, as I said, precisely in a judicial way except so far as my representation of a Western and agriculture State may influence my judgment, being, as I am, anxious for cheap transportation. Every Western Senator, every Western citizen, knows that every bushel of corn or wheat that goes to New York—and all our agricultural products go to New York—that goes there cheapened in transportation is so much more in the pockets of the men who raise that wheat and that corn.

I would not destroy the navigation interests upon the Arthur Kill; it would be unjust to arbitrarily pass any measure that would do this; but I say to those navigation interests, as I did to the steamboatmen on the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers, "You must give and take; you must recognize changed conditions and changed methods; you must recognize the fact that three-fourths of the transportation of this country is in the hands of the railroads, and that that proportion will increase. You can not appeal from the irresistible decrees of God and nature." These streams can never be made again to become the exclusive means of transportation for the carrying trade of this continent. I would not arbitrarily destroy them, and I have conscientiously and honestly endeavored to strike what is the just medium between these two conflicting interests in my action in the committee and in the Senate.

Now I come to the legal proposition involved. Mr. Courtlandt Parker, a very eminent lawyer, argued the case on behalf of the adverse interest to the construction of this bridge in a brief which I read and reread with great interest, because as a professional production it is almost without a peer, and as a lawyer he is entitled to my intense admiration, and I say so publicly. I took the pains to examine every authority cited by Mr. Parker, and to go through the whole case as a lawyer to the best of my ability. The main authority upon which Mr. Parker relies, it may be said almost exclusively, is that of Gilman vs. The City of Philadelphia, found in 3 Wallace, 713. He also cites 8 Curtis, 105, the case of Wilson vs. The Blackbird Creek Company, which is a leading case in the decisions of the Supreme Court; 18 Howard, 232, State of Pennsylvania vs. The Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company, and Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, 15 Curtis.

Whatever may have been the opinion of jurists in the past with regard to the right of Congress to construct bridges and to control navigation or commerce across navigable streams, I say to-day without any hesitation that that question has been settled and settled forever. It is not necessary now to discuss the power of Congress as against the power of a State Legislature to authorize the construction of bridges over internal streams; and I mean by that expression a stream which is entirely within one State and where the State or the citizens of the State own the soil upon each side of the proposed bridge.

The bridge that is proposed to be constructed in the present case is what is called a tidal bridge. It is where the tide ebbs and flows. In regard to that class of structures the Supreme Court have decided so often and so emphatically that the construction of bridges is exclusively within the jurisdiction of Congress whenever Congress sees proper to exercise it, that the lawyer who to-day would say that it does not exist would simply make himself absurd and ridiculous before the profession. If the Legislature of a State sees proper, even as to an internal stream, to exercise its jurisdiction and authorize the construction of a bridge Congress could nullify, to use the expression, or abrogate the exercise of that jurisdiction if Congress came to the conclusion that it was a navigable stream or came within the constitutional clause which confers on Congress power to regulate commerce among the several States. But pretermitting that discussion over an arm of the sea, over an estuary or a river where the tide ebbs and flows, there is no sort of doubt that Congress has the jurisdiction to say whether a bridge shall be constructed or not, and no State can interfere with the exercise of that discretion.

If a State sees proper to exercise its municipal jurisdiction over the land on either side, it can do so; but even in that case, if Congress sees proper to authorize the construction of a bridge under the constitutional clause to which I have referred, and in the exercise of that jurisdiction it is necessary to take a portion of the soil of the State or condemn it for the purpose of putting abutments or piers in order to construct the bridge, that power absolutely rests with the Congress of the United States and nowhere else.

The cases which are cited by Mr. Parker absolutely demonstrate this position, outside of the recent Georgia case which is cited in the report of the committee. Therefore till this proposition is contested I shall leave it where it is with the statement that this is a question for the discretion of Congress under the jurisdiction which is absolutely vested in us by the Federal Constitution.

Now as to the details of this structure the Senator from New Jersey says we have relied on the opinion of Major Gillespie. Not so. As a matter of course that opinion had great weight with the committee. He is an engineer officer of the United States. He is familiar with these waters. It was his official duty to make this report to Congress, and he has made it over and over again. He is absolutely corrupt or absolutely incompetent or else this bridge should be constructed as is provided in this bill. But aside from that report, aside from the vast interests involved in the way of cheap transportation, let us look at the details of the bridge itself.

The bill provides for a pivot draw-bridge over a stream 600 feet wide, with two spans of 200 feet each upon either side of the pivot-pier. It has all the safeguards in regard to opening the draws. No draw-bridge of over 200 feet span has been constructed over any stream. It is sufficient to say now that engineers, no matter how they may have inclined upon questions of the construction of bridges, have never recommended the construction of any draw-bridge with a span of over 200 feet. Over the Mississippi River that draw has been found ample and complete. In the State of New Jersey there are draws, as we were informed by the evidence before the committee, of 70 feet, and that over streams nearly as wide as this Arthur Kill.

It is provided in the bill not that this bridge shall be 32 feet above the surface of the stream or above the highest part of the superstructure, but it is provided that it shall not be less than 32 feet, and the bill further provides that the Secretary of War, assisted by the engineer officers, shall consider the details of the construction of the bridge and fix the height, and put such additional safeguards as may be necessary in order to preserve the navigation interest.

The whole question in a nutshell is, shall the State of New Jersey, much as I respect that State and her honored Senators upon this floor, shall the Pennsylvania Railroad with its 400,000,000 of capital—I say that in no acrimonious sense, but simply because I want to emphasize the vast interests and the importance of that corporation—shall even the State of New Jersey and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company say that this Congress shall not authorize a bridge in which the carrying trade of the whole country is interested and all the producing interests of the country, when the Secretary of War, when the Engineer Bureau, and when common sense tell you that it will be no obstruction to navigation except such as is absolutely necessary in the construction of a bridge across a navigable stream.

If the Senator from New Jersey thinks it necessary to put additional safeguards in the bill, let him do so. He can provide for sheer-booms, drop-booms, so that every craft that comes can be dropped through these draws without any danger.

It was said before the committee and principally urged that the smaller craft, the hundreds of thousands of smaller boats that are to pass through this bridge would be in danger. Why, sir, is it possible, even if the lowest bridge should be resorted to, 32 feet high—and the Engineer Bureau can go as much above that as they think proper—but even putting it at 32 feet, how, as the Senator from Maine says, could the smaller craft be in danger. Sloops, schooners, oyster boats, and other craft that are used upon Arthur Kill could go through; and after all it is a question for the discretion and the public honesty and the public capacity of the Engineer Bureau when these conflicting interests are brought together upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator whether the committee considered the question in reference to the tunnel that is spoken of?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course that was urged upon us, and urged upon us in the different arguments that were made. We heard the case over and over again. From the evidence we had in regard to the nature of the soil upon either side and as to the practicability and expense of a tunnel, and principally from our conclusion as to whether this bridge would impede navigation, we found that in our judgment a bridge was better than a tunnel and less expensive.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I must say that some of the statements just made by the Senator from Missouri seem to me very extraordinary. I understand him to say that this is a combination of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the State of New Jersey as against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad system.

Mr. VEST. I made no such assertion. I did not want to say anything that would have so offensive a signification as the word "combination" might imply. I do mean to say this, and my friend from New Jersey shall have the benefit of it frankly: I mean to say that the Pennsylvania Railroad and these New Jersey interests are against this bill; and it was so represented in our committee. I do not say there was any combination or understanding. I know nothing about that. I stated it simply as it appeared. The advocates of the opposite side of the question to the passage of the bill were gentlemen representing the State of New Jersey as they claimed, and it was also very evident that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company were represented too.

Mr. MCPHERSON. With all due respect to the Senator I wish to say that what I said was a necessary conclusion I drew from the statements he made.

Now I should like the Senator from Missouri to say in what respect the bill reported by the committee of which he is an honored member cripples the Pennsylvania Railroad from enjoying all the privileges given by the bill to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. I read, beginning in line 20 of section 1 of the bill:

> That all railway companies desiring to use the said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage over the same, and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof and of all the approaches thereto, for a reasonable compensation to be paid to the owners of said bridge under and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties in case they shall not agree.

It is a bridge not for the Baltimore and Ohio Railway. There can be no conflict of interests as between the Pennsylvania or any other system in New Jersey and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad under this bill. If the advantages the Baltimore and Ohio system are to receive by crossing this stream and having a location at the other end of Staten Island are of such vast consequence as the Senator avers them to be for the great commercial interests of this country, will not the Pennsylvania system, will not the New Jersey Central, the Lehigh Valley, and the other lines which have sought access to water privileges on the shore of New Jersey also be empowered to cross to Staten Island? It is perfectly absurd to say that it is not so.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? The provision of the bill which he has cited appears in all our bridge bills. It is a general provision, which answers fully the position he asumed a short time ago that we should be flooded with bills for bridges across the Arthur Kill. Other railroad corporations can avail themselves of the provision. Now I ask the Senator—for we ought to be frank with each other in the discussion of this measure—if he does not know as a fact that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company do oppose the construction of this bridge? As to their reasons they are entirely within the ken of that company. I have nothing to do with them, but I ask him if it is not a fact and if he does not know it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to answer just as frankly as the Senator has put his question. I do not know what the object or purpose of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company may be touching this bill. I know nothing as to their wishes touching the bill. I have never had any conference with any member of the board of officers of that road or with anybody who represents them; but I can say to the Senator as within my knowledge that the Pennsylvania Railroad have a station at South Amboy for the transportation of coal for distribution through New England, for distribution through New York to each and every point of the Hudson River, over an area of hundreds of miles around the harbor of New York. That coal passes through the Arthur Kill of necessity. It dare not go outside of Staten Island, for that in stormtime means wrecking to all those who undertake to go through that channel.

I can easily see that the Pennsylvania Railroad would be opposed to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate reporting a bill which would impair the navigation of the stream so as to place the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad on better terms of competition with them than they could otherwise be. I can see a reason why the Lehigh Valley people, I can see a reason why the New Jersey Central should oppose it. Those three lines are located upon the west shore of this stream. They are at the end of the railroad transit, so to speak.

The Senator is mistaken when he says this channel is a part of the great commerce of the country between the West and the East. It is not true. It is the end of rail commerce, and it is a great system used for the distribution of that commerce. What is the commerce? It is coal, it is of articles heavy and bulky that it is impossible to transport farther by rail. The coal that goes to New England passes through this channel and goes to all the New England ports. It is there put on cars and distributed to all parts of New England. There is a direct railroad communication between New England and the coal field, but it is so much easier and cheaper to transport it by boat that it goes for that reason by that mode.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say for myself and I want to say for New Jersey that neither the Pennsylvania Railroad nor any other railroad that has had access to New Jersey soil has ever had the audacity to ask the Legislature of New Jersey for the right to cross this stream with a bridge. As I said yesterday there is no State in this Union in which the franchise to build railroads is as free as it is upon the soil of New Jersey. We hail with delight any and every railroad corporation by whatever name and coming from whatever source it may that comes to our State to enjoy its privileges under free and unrestricted laws. We ask only that they behave themselves and pay their taxes, and New Jersey would as freely confer upon the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad a franchise as upon the Pennsylvania or any other line. No railroad company owns New Jersey.

Mr. President, to get back to the subject, I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. He says the committee considered the question of a tunnel, but he does not say why they did not recommend a tunnel. Will he please answer me that question?

Mr. VEST. I stated that we came to the conclusion that this bridge was cheaper and better, that it did not destroy the navigation interests, and that we did not think it was right or necessary or in order for us in considering this bill to take up the contemplated project of a tunnel, which was not before us except as an argument against this bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I think the Senator will not find fault with me if I should state in this connection that it was more for the interest of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company that a bridge should be built than a tunnel.

Mr. VEST. The question before us was simply this, should we, in the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon us by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States, say whether this bridge bill should pass or not, and that we should determine the question whether the construction of the bridge interfered with the navigability of Arthur Kill. That was the only question. The only way the tunnel ever came before us was that it was brought before the committee by the opponents of this bill, who said, "Why do you not build a tunnel?" We did not think it was our duty to go into the statistics and the details of the construction of a tunnel, but that it was our duty to pass upon the question whether the construction of this bridge would interfere with the navigability of this stream.

Mr. McPHERSON. The stream is 600 feet wide, less than the length of this Capitol building. The bed of solid standstone underneath in which to construct a tunnel. The water is about 14 or 15 feet deep. The approaches to the tunnel are upon ground almost level with the water itself. There is no reason in the world why a tunnel should not be built. No place in the world can be found where a tunnel could be more economically built, and yet the Senator from Missouri says that the committee decided that as inasmuch as the railroad bridge which they proposed to make did not interfere with the navigation of the stream, therefore they did not consider the tunnel project at all. Now let us see about that. Let us see how well the committee have advised the Senate on that subject.

Suppose the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad alone without any other road run trains across this bridge. Other lines are to have the same privilege; it is just as much for the Pennsylvania Railroad as for the Baltimore and Ohio, and if it were entirely a Pennsylvania Railroad scheme I should oppose it just as much. If they run as many trains over this proposed bridge daily as the Pennsylvania line of railroad runs into Jersey City and out of it, it would amount to over three hundred trains a day. There are one hundred and seventeen thousand vessels running up and down the stream annually, or amounting to nearly four hundred per day.

Now, sir, allow twelve working hours of the day as a suitable time for the opening and closing of the draw to enable a boat or a train to pass. If you allow fifteen minutes, it would require a working day of fifty hours to permit the draw to be opened and closed for the amount of traffic; and still the committee says it does not, and can not, and will not interfere with commerce! The Senator says that the committee believe it will be no injury to navigation. And he goes further. He says that all applications of new enterprises desiring facilities should be considered alike. Very true. In the case of the Mississippi River and on all great streams the same rule that obtains in one case in the construction of a bridge obtains in almost all.

If some other line of road starting from the Senator's State should reach the Arthur Kill and should apply to a committee of Congress to give them facilities to cross the Arthur Kill by a bridge, certainly Congress would not impose more severe terms on that new corporation, which perhaps might be unable to expend quite as much as a wealthy powerful corporation like the Baltimore and Ohio, and that would be an additional reason why facilities should be given to that corporation instead of an older and more wealthy one. Suppose it shall apply for permission to cross the stream, the Senator certainly would not impose upon it more conditions than are already imposed on the Baltimore and Ohio. What is the consequence? The very moment this permission is given that is the end of all commerce upon Arthur Kill. Other lines would apply for like permission, bridges would be multiplied, and commerce would cease.

Mr. FRYE. I have just received a communication which I think it is important the Senate should have touching this tunnel matter. It is from one of the vice-presidents of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and has just been handed to me:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 20, 1886.

SIR: In the RECORD of yesterday I note that Senator McPHERSON offered to amend the Kill von Kull bridge bill by striking out the word bridge and substituting tunnel. The question of tunneling the Arthur Kill has been thoroughly considered by our engineering department and found to be impracticable, owing to the enormous cost entailed. I herewith submit to you some data in relation to their examination of the subject.

To build a tunnel under the Arthur Kill would require the subgrade of the same to be 63 feet below low tide, which depth will be necessary to give the required roofing below the bed of stream over the crown of the tunnel arch. The length of the approach on the west, or Jersey, shore would be 4,800 feet. The length of tunnel would be 13,509 feet, or over 2.55 miles. The length of the east approach on Staten Island shore would be 7,000 feet, making a total length of tunnel and approaches of 25,309 feet, or 4.8 miles. In addition to this, it would necessitate the crossing at grade of the Pennsylvania Railroad tracks at or near Elizabeth. This, with the fact of ascending and descending grades to the tunnel, would make the line difficult to maintain and operate.

The question may be fairly asked, What requires the great length of tunnel and approach? This is made necessary owing to the salt meadows and the ebb and flow of the tide covering them, which makes it necessary that the tunnel should be extended beyond the point of high water to prevent it being flooded at every change of the tide. Careful estimates have been made of the cost of a tunnel there, and our engineers find that the sum will aggregate $5,000,000, instead of $700,000, the Senator from New Jersey estimated it at. This estimate has been carefully considered, and our reports show that it can not possibly be done for less, even if at that sum.

All tunnels of this character projected in this country under large streams, notably the tunnel under the Hudson River and the one under the Detroit River, have exceeded the cost estimated for the work, and the engineers of the same have been compelled to stop work owing to the large increased cost and great difficulties encountered in the construction of the same.

In reply to the statement made by the Standard Chemical Company with regard to the great obstruction of navigation to be imposed by this bridge I would beg to say that the tow frontage of the largest tows carried through the kill are about 80 feet and the direction of the current is normal to the line of the piers which are proposed to be built. The average rate of the current is from two and a quarter to two and a half miles per hour. The clear water way on both sides of the pier is 216 feet. Under these conditions it is clearly impossible that any obstruction could be imposed upon the free and uninterrupted towage through these water ways.

These views are fully substantiated by the reports of the board of United States engineer officers which are before you.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

THOS. M. KING,
Second Vice-President Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Subcommittee of Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I had anticipated the presentation of this extraordinary paper I should also have been prepared to present one in substantiation of what I said yesterday touching the cost of the tunnel.

There is one particular statement in this paper that I wish to call attention to. The writer says the approach to the tunnel must be 4,800 feet from the tunnel itself; that it must be 60 feet under the water. A short distance above that where it would propose to build a tunnel or where the bridge is proposed to be built an attempt was made to tunnel the Hudson River on shores precisely the same as found on the Arthur Kill, and the distance from the mouth of the tunnel where it was to enter the river provided by that company was a little less than 2,000 feet—I think 1,800. Here I think it is proposed to go back 4,800 feet. In fact, no more extravagant statement was ever made in the world, and everybody can see its purpose. Such a statement may be a surprise, but will scarcely be influential.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not propose to discuss this bill at length. There are two questions involved. At least two questions have been discussed to some extent, and two questions were elaborately presented before the Committee on Commerce. One is the power of Congress to authorize the construction of this bridge, and the other is the necessity and propriety of the bridge.

If there is any question which has been finally and conclusively settled by a long course of judicial decisions by the highest judicial tribunal of this country, the Supreme Court of the United States, that question, I think, is the question of the power of Congress to authorize the construction of bridges over navigable streams.

As I understand the law at the present time it is settled that Congress, under the clause of the Constitution which confers upon it power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations, has power to determine what is an obstruction to a navigable stream and to authorize the construction of bridges over the navigable waters of the United States, whether they form the boundary between two or more States or Territories, or whether they are wholly within the boundaries of States; that Congress never having occupied the field and undertaken to regulate by a general law the construction of bridges over streams wholly within the boundaries of States, a State Legislature may authorize the construction of a bridge over such a stream, and although such a bridge when constructed is an obstruction in fact to commerce, it is a lawful structure. But they have also held in many well-considered decisions that a State law can not authorize the construction of a bridge over a navigable stream which forms the boundary between two or more States, and, as I have said, the power of Congress extends to all the streams of the country that are navigable in fact.

In some of the early decisions, following the English decisions, it was held that a navigable stream must be a stream in which the tide ebbed and flowed, but in the case of the Genesee Chief, reported in 12 Howard, decided about the year 1851, those earlier decisions were reversed, and it was declared that a stream which is navigable in fact is navigable in law, and that the power of Congress to regulate commerce upon such streams and to authorize or prohibit obstructions upon the waters of the country extended to every river or stream which was navigable in fact.

In the case of the Wheeling Bridge Company, reported in 13 Howard, the State of Virginia had undertaken to construct a bridge over the Ohio River under an act of the Legislature of Virginia. It was an obstruction to commerce. Some of the vessels which had been constructed to ply on the Ohio River had masts and smoke-stacks of such height that they could not pass under the bridge, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that the bridge was an unlawful obstruction and ordered it taken down. Afterward Congress passed an act legalizing the bridge. The case was then a second time brought up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and is reported in 18 Howard. The Supreme Court held that Congress had the power under the Constitution to make lawful a bridge which was an obstruction in fact to commerce, Congress having power to determine what should be considered an obstruction to a navigable stream. In Bridge Company vs. United States (15 Otto, 470), it was held that the paramount power of regulating bridges that affect the navigation of the navigable waters of the United States is in Congress. In the case of the Escanaba Company vs. Chicago, reported in 107 United States Reports, 682, the same doctrine was affirmed. The court say:

> The power vested in the General Government to regulate interstate and foreign commerce involves the control of the waters of the United States which are navigable in fact, so far as it may be necessary to insure their free navigation, when by themselves or their connection with other waters they form a continuous channel for commerce among the States or with foreign countries.

Citing the case of The Daniel Ball, 10 Wallace, 557. Then the court say:

> Such is the case with the Chicago River and its branches.

The court held that in the case of a stream wholly within the limits of a State, like the Chicago River, until Congress has interfered and prescribed some regulation concerning the construction of bridges an act of the State Legislature is sufficient to authorize the obstruction of the stream and the construction of a bridge. But they say further, however, referring to this power of the State to authorize the construction of bridges:

> When its power is exercised so as to unnecessarily obstruct the navigation of the river or its branches, Congress may interfere and remove the obstruction. If the power of the State and that of the Federal Government come in conflict, the latter must control and the former yield. This necessarily follows from the position given by the Constitution to legislation in pursuance of it as the supreme law of the land.

This case was decided in October, 1882. In October, 1884, a case which was appealed from the ninth circuit, from the district of California, the case of John T. Cardwell vs. American Bridge Company, 113 United States Reports, was decided, in which the same doctrine was enunciated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have to interrupt the Senator from Oregon to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. 714) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that that be laid aside informally and that the consideration of the bridge bill may be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The special order will be laid aside informally and the consideration of Senate bill No. 121 continued:

Mr. DOLPH. I shall not take up further time on the legal question. I have references to a large number of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States to the same point, but, as I said at the outset, I consider the question so thoroughly settled by a long course of judicial decisions that the lawyer who would undertake to dispute the proposition of the power of Congress to authorize the construction of bridges over streams which are navigable in fact, within the States and Territories, or those which form the boundary between States or between a State and a Territory, must either be uninformed as to the course of judicial decision, or must have more temerity than the average lawyer has.

Congress, then, having power to authorize the construction of this bridge, the question arises, ought the construction of the bridge to be authorized? Will the commerce of the whole country be promoted by the construction of the bridge? As was said by the Senator from Missouri, there will always be a difference of opinion between those interested in transportation by railroads and those interested in the commerce of the rivers whenever it is proposed to construct a bridge across a navigable river that will in any way interfere with navigation. There is no bridge which can be constructed that will not prove some obstruction to navigation, and the question always is, when authority to construct a bridge is asked, whether or not the entire commerce of the country will be promoted by the construction of the bridge?

I propose to examine briefly the question of the benefit to commerce of the construction of this bridge. In the first place, it will extend the limited wharf and harbor facilities of the city of New York by adding to them something like 10 miles of deep-water frontage on Staten Island, at which the trains of cars loaded with the produce of the country can discharge their freight immediately into the vessels which are to take them to foreign countries, and at which the imports which are brought into the port of New York may be loaded directly from the vessels that bring the merchandise upon the trains of cars, to be distributed through the extensive railroad systems of the United States all over the country.

Owing to the limited harbor and wharf facilities at the city of New York, I am informed that the terminal charges are unusual. I have seen it stated somewhere that during a freight war between the different railroad companies operating roads between Chicago to New York not long since the rate was reduced to 12 cents per 100 pounds, and that 4 cents of this was required to pay the terminal charges at New York. In short, every bushel of grain that is raised in the great West and is sent to New York has to pay in the way of lighterage, for handling, for ferriage, and terminal charges so much, that it becomes a burdensome tax upon the producers of the country; and so with goods which are imported.

This is therefore a question not alone between the State of New Jersey and the city of New York, not alone between the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, but it is New Jersey against the nation, and I might say New Jersey against the world, because the terminal charge at New York is to a greater or less extent directly or indirectly a tax upon the entire commerce of the United States.

I suppose that no one will deny the importance of opening up the shores of Staten Island bordering on the New York Bay to commerce and utilizing that river front. In fact no one had the temerity to do it before the committee and no one has had the temerity to do it in the discussion of this bill in the Senate. The only question appears to be how shall it be done.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] proposes a tunnel, and the Senator from Missouri admitted, as I understand, that at some stage of the discussion before the committee a tunnel had been suggested. My recollection is different. If a tunnel was suggested at all before the committee it was at some meeting when I was not present, or it must have been at a previous Congress. As was said by the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Missouri, the suggestion of a tunnel comes from the opponents of this bill. The railroad company or companies proposing to build this bridge are not asking for a tunnel. They come here and show that a tunnel is impracticable.

But what has Congress to do with authorizing a tunnel under Arthur Kill? Will the Senator from New Jersey answer me? What power has Congress to say that a railroad company chartered under the laws of a State may build a tunnel under a navigable stream? Does that interfere with commerce? Is that a regulation of commerce? Is that within the constitutional power of Congress? Not at all. If these railroad companies desire to tunnel under Arthur Kill I undertake to say they may make a tunnel without the permission of Congress. The only power of Congress is to regulate commerce and to prevent obstructions to navigable streams; but when it is proposed to tunnel under a stream, when you get beneath the bed rock there is no interference with commerce, and there is no necessity for getting the consent of Congress to do that. In fact Congress has no power whatever to authorize it. The act would be a nullity. It would confer no authority whatever upon the company. Such an amendment in any event ought not to be adopted. The bill should be voted on upon its merits and should be either passed or defeated.

Will the bridge proposed to be built under the provisions of this bill be such an unusual obstruction to the commerce of Arthur Kill that Congress ought not to authorize it? It is said that the stream at the point where it is proposed to bridge it is only 600 feet wide. What difference does it make how wide it is? Whatever the width of the stream may be the commerce must pass through the two draws, which are to be 200 feet in width, or under the bridge.

As is said in the report of the Committee on Commerce to accompany the bill, the committee are not aware that there is a bridge in the United States that has a draw exceeding in width that provided for in the bill, 200 feet. The vast commerce of the Upper Mississippi River passes through numerous draws, many of which are not 200 feet in width. The lumber fleets, the fleets of coal barges, the fleets of wheat barges that pass down that river pass through draws of 200 feet and less, and the tows of great canal-boats coming through the Erie Canal, or made up at Albany and towed down the Hudson River, pass through a bridge or bridges of less draw.

But still it is claimed that here in Arthur Kill, which has a current as has been stated of two miles and a half an hour only, a bridge with draws of 200 feet in width would be such an obstruction that Congress ought not to authorize its construction. It also appears from the report of the committee, and was so stated before the committee by persons who are well informed, that nearly all the commerce of Arthur Kill is by canal boats and barges, which are towed by tugs; that the canal boats and barges can all pass under the bridge without the opening of the draw; that a large majority of the tugs can pass under the bridge without the opening of the draw, and that those which have smoke-stacks so high that they could not pass under a bridge of the height that this is proposed to be built can easily have their smoke-stacks so arranged that they can be lowered when they pass under it. It was shown also that there are very few vessels with masts passing there, and very few vessels would come down through this shallow channel which are destined for foreign ports.

So while in the aggregate, considering the commerce which is carried on through the kill, the amount is not large which would require the opening of the draw, and the number of vessels the passage of which would be impeded by this bridge is very small, it is estimated that there will be $200,000,000 in value of commerce passing over this railroad and on to Staten Island annually after the bridge is constructed. It is not claimed by the opponents of the bill that the value of the commerce that passes through this water way is more than a small fraction of this amount.

So the committee came to the conclusion, and I think the Senate will come to the conclusion, that the advantages to commerce by the construction of this bridge are so great that the inconvenience which the commerce of Arthur Kill will suffer by the construction of the bridge ought to be suffered for the public good. Every dollar in terminal charges which is saved by the construction of this bridge and by the utilization of this water front upon Staten Island is a dollar saved for the producers and consumers of the entire West. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I regretted to hear the statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is chairman of the subcommittee on the bill of the Commerce Committee, that there had been several hearings before that committee and that ample opportunities had been given to the opponents of this measure, and that the committee had given it the fullest, freest, and fairest attention. I attended, I think, all the three meetings that the committee had on this subject, and on each of those occasions I think there were present from ten to twenty of the leading opponents of this measure, presidents and captains of tow-boat associations and vessel owners, and I remember distinctly that those hearings on both sides amounted on each occasion to not over an hour or an hour and a half. While the committee was supposed to meet at 10 o'clock, it did not get a quorum together until nearly 11. I mean by a quorum, a quorum of the subcommittee. I do not know of any occasion where the full committee met to have a hearing.

My recollection is that there were only three members of that committee present at any one time, and that many of the gentlemen who were at the expense of coming here at the invitation of the committee went away unheard. In one case which came to my personal notice, that of Major Burr, who is the civil engineer in charge of the Government work on the river, he came before the committee to give his views but was unable to do so, and left his brief with me to be sent to the committee afterward; and he is positively opposed to the construction of the bridge at the point named and in the manner proposed.

The Senate, on the two or three occasions when this matter has been presented to them, collectively as a body and individually, has not had a proper appreciation of what this stream of water has done in the shape of the transportation of the products of the country. The Arthur Kill connects the Raritan Bay with the Newark Bay and the Kill von Kull, debouching into New York Bay, and is the connecting inland water with the North River, Long Island Sound, and the commerce to the eastward, coastwise. To the south it connects by way of the Raritan River, the Delaware and Raritan Canal, the Delaware River, the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, the Chesapeake Bay, and the sounds away down into North Carolina, and with the Delaware River to the ocean. It runs practically an inside channel for interstate commerce from North Carolina away up to the Schuylkill Canal and up the North River to the Erie Canal, and through the Erie Canal, and permeates half the country.

By tows is the principal way of transmission of the commerce from the different feeders of the Arthur Kill. There is first the Delaware and Raritan Canal; and the statement of this very engineer, who has charge of these works, who could not be heard before the committee, is to the effect that that canal at one time did a business of 5,500,000 tons, but that since the construction of the bridge over the Raritan River, which is a similar one and the largest in the country to-day and with the largest draw, by reason of the obstruction which it affords to the passage of boats, by reason of the loss and damage occurring there, a thousand tons of freight having been smashed against the piers at a time, and by reason of the fact that the piers in the bridge have changed the current, the tonnage of that great internal artificial navigation has been reduced to about 2,000,000 tons. I was surprised at the statement myself. I knew it had been reduced some, but I was not prepared to hear that the construction of that bridge had absolutely reduced 50 per cent. the commerce of that canal.

A short distance from its mouth is the Amboy division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the terminus for the supplies of all the gasworks to the eastward and the soft coal supplies for the steam-power in and around the vicinity of New York, including the foreign ships. Amboy is the terminal point for that class of coal. They are made up in tows to go to New York.

Below a short distance is the Lehigh Valley terminus, which is a hard coal terminus, and which distributes coal all over New England and up the North River and every place in the immediate vicinity of New York, the tows being made up so as to make the transportation more convenient and cheaper. The soft-coal tows are made up so as to take them alongside of a steamer or take them alongside of a wharf for a gas company, or any place else; and they run right up and drop their coal, and the boat shoves off, and the steamer comes back the next day, picks them up, and brings them back again. The canal tows are made up partly of canal-boats, partly of three-masted schooners, partly of barges of a thousand, tons that may have a width of 125 feet and a length of 2,100.

So when the statement is made here that the commerce of this great artery is in canal-boats and simply towed by tugs, and that they can get under a 32-foot bridge or through an open way of 200 feet, it is not true. I state myself, from public knowledge of the situation, that it is a physical impossibility. Steamers take these tows, made up of forty and fifty vessels, which have a cargo of more than 10,000 tons, and which run from 1,800 to 2,100 feet in length, and it is impossible for them to go through a passage-way 200 feet wide. The very framework of the steamers themselves is such as to run up to 70 feet.

The engineer officer in charge, and I mean by that the responsible officer in charge, Colonel Gillespie, has given us his opinion that the tonnage is 16,000,000 tons passing through here. If so, it is the largest in this country, larger than that of the Mississippi River, larger than that of the Detroit River, larger than that of the port of New York, and larger than that of the North River. He says that that tonnage can be passed in that way through a pivot-draw in the center of a 600-foot channel with 200-foot openings. If you ask him why he said so he will say "it can de done." So do I. Twice as much can be passed; but in doing so you put the cost upon it so great that you destroy the whole thing. You can not undertake to bring a tow, as represented in the map, 2,100 feet long, through that channel without the meeting of tides, without stopping and anchoring. It is almost an impossibility, because it gluts up the whole channel, and you would have to divide it into six or eight tows in order to pass it through the bridge.

I have here an accurate survey and report of this whole question made up for the counsel of the different transportation companies and the individual owners of boats on the kills. It was intended for use in the courts when it was threatened that this bridge would be built against the State authorities.

I will say before I go into that question that I was sorry to hear expressions in relation to the different railroad interests in connection with this matter. If anybody knows about it I ought to know. I have never heard of any opposition on the part of any railroad company to the construction of a bridge that would fairly pass the tonnage of that river. There is no jealousy and no feeling and no desire to keep out the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from a terminus at Staten Island if that company so desire. I have no knowledge that they do. The fact is that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company have not gotten a road in the State of New Jersey or beyond Philadelphia. The only evidence that they have got any connection with that bridge is that under the general railroad law of the State of New Jersey which allows any seven men who have $2,000 per mile to put in the hands of the treasurer as an evidence of good faith to lay out and construct a road. Six miles of road connecting with the end of the proposed bridge was laid out and filed in the office of the secretary of state of New Jersey, and $12,000 of money deposited on it. It goes nowhere and ends nowhere.

Beyond that nothing has been done in the State of New Jersey to show that the Baltimore and Ohio road are ever going to build a mile of their road, and nothing has been done on that 6 miles; not a spadeful of ground has been turned. On the other side of the river there is a small local road termed the Staten Island Transit Company, owned and controlled by a gentleman named Wiman for speculative purposes. It was offered for sale a year ago, and it is said it has since been contracted for by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Mr. FRYE. That is on the island?

Mr. SEWELL. That is on the island. I do not know that that is true, but I merely give what is the common talk; that the contract is conditioned on giving an authority to construct a bridge across that arm of the sea, and it is said that a small part of the contract money has been paid, and that this is a speculative move on the part of a citizen—no, for he is not even a citizen of the United States; a gentleman living on Staten Island interested in land. So far as I am able to judge, so far as the personal relations between myself and the different railroads entering the State of New Jersey engaged in interstate commerce, I have not even the knowledge that the Baltimore and Ohio have any idea of constructing that line, and I have the knowledge that the other companies, the Pennsylvania, the Lehigh Valley, and the Central have not a particle of objection to the construction, except the objection which comes to them collaterally by the towing companies in which they are interested in the distribution of their freights. In fact, if this is going to be a great benefit to the country at large they would desire, in my opinion every one of them, to take advantage of crossing a bridge and getting a terminus probably for coal on Staten Island, and if the bridge could be so constructed, and it can very easily be done, so as not to present an absolute barrier to the transportation from the different termini both of the canals and the railroads on the Bay of New York as at present used, all parties would be pleased.

The report, as I have stated, was made by an eminent engineer, and is in a condition to be substantiated, as it was intended to be used in the courts.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator inform me what that report is?

Mr. SEWELL. This is a report made by one of the leading engineers of our State for the counsel of the different companies and individual owners of vessels to be used in our State court in case there was any contest about this bridge, and it is ready to be substantiated at any time. I have gone over it very carefully myself, and I would not use it if I did not know that it was correct. The engineer says:

JERSEY CITY, N. J., April 14, 1886.

BARKER GUMMERE, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your instructions that I should make a professional examination of the projected scheme for the extension of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad across Arthur Kill or Staten Island Sound by means of a drawbridge or viaduct, particularly as to the effect such a construction would have upon the navigation, riparian, or other interests dependent in a large degree upon that channel being retained free from all obstructions, I have the honor to report as follows:

The inquiry has covered a very wide field of research, and though opinion and rough estimates of the several items of information bearing upon the question at issue were easily obtainable, it has been a work of much time and labor to secure the properly authenticated data which only could be of use as evidence in the case of legal complication. At an early stage in the work I discovered that there was no hydrographic survey of the kill later than one executed by the United States engineers, under the direction of General John Newton, in 1872. By the courtesy of the United States engineers, I was enabled to make copies of this survey, also of the original survey of the kill made by the United States Coast Survey in 1855.

The changes in the sections of the bottom of the stream between 1855 and 1872, shown by a comparison of these surveys, was so great that I deemed it of the utmost importance that we should have a survey at the present time, in order to see if these changes still continued, and to be able to argue understandingly the effect the encroachment upon the section of the stream by building piers would have upon its usefulness as a navigable channel.

Moreover, examination and inquiry led me to believe that the engineers of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company had made during the past season careful hydrographic surveys over the same ground, which they would be ready to submit to any board of United States engineers which might be detailed by the Secretary of War to examine into the feasibility of bridging this stream. Presumably these surveys would not show too glaringly the facts against the bridge, and unless these facts were presented in a perfect and well-authenticated form, the navigation and other interests opposed to a bridge might suffer.

That this might not be the case, you directed me to make a proper survey of that portion of the kill lying between Elizabethport and Buckwheat Island for use in this controversy. Such a survey has been made, and I am happy to say that I think it adds materially to strengthen our view of the question. I shall allude to the facts brought out by this survey in the proper place in this report.

For the purpose of systematizing the report I shall divide it into the following heads:

First. General description of Arthur Kill and relations which it bears to other channels tributary to the harbor of New York.

These are the different headings of the report.

Second. Commerce and comparison with commerce of other streams.

Third. Manufacturing and riparian interests on the Jersey shore and grants made by the State, with improvements made under said grants.

Fourth. Proposed project of Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company as far as developed.

Fifth. Regimen of channel in the vicinity of proposed site of bridge as determined by soundings and current observation.

Sixth. Probable changes in channel from erection of piers in the stream.

Seventh. Increase of cost of water transportation imposed by necessity of passing the draw.

That is, one of the particular portions of the report, and the probable changes in the channel by the proposed erection of the piers in the stream.

Eighth. Effect upon value of water-front property.

Ninth. Action of Government engineers upon question of bridging other navigable channels, and comparisons with the channel in question.

Tenth. Other means of crossing the stream which will not interfere with navigation interests.

To illustrate certain of the facts under discussion I have prepared three maps, marked A, B, and C.

Map A is a general chart showing the harbor of New York and its approaches, with the depth of water in the different channels and bodies of water which together constitute that harbor.

Map B shows the whole extent of Arthur Kill, with the latest soundings by United States engineers in 1872, except where I have made soundings for this research; also, the riparian lines as established by the riparian commissioners of New Jersey, and recommended by the United States engineer for the Staten Island shore; also, the grants and leases of riparian lands made by the State of New Jersey, and the location of manufacturing and other improvements along the shores.

Map C shows hydrographic survey made for this investigation, showing on a large scale the Kill from Buckwheat Island to Elizabethport, with position of proposed bridge, soundings, current directions, &c; also, sections of the kill at eight points, showing changes between the soundings of 1855, 1872, and 1886; also, section on line of proposed bridge showing probable reduction of area of section by piers.

First. General description of Arthur Kill and relation which it bears to other channels tributary to the harbor of New York:

Arthur Kill, or Staten Island Sound, is an arm of the sea, extending from Newark Bay to Raritan Bay, between the mainland of New Jersey and Staten Island, New York. It has a length of 12 miles, and a width varying from 3,600 feet to 600 feet. It is navigable for vessels drawing 12 feet of water at mean low tide throughout its whole extent. The channel is tortuous and in places very narrow; it will be seen by inspection of map A that in these features it surpasses all the other arms or tributaries of New York Harbor. The bottom in the center of the channel and where the scour has effect is hard sand, overlying the red sandstone belt which forms the upper rock strata extending across the State from the Delaware River to the New York State line between the Palisades and marl beds of Middle New Jersey on the east and the mountains of gneiss on the west, the rock itself, I should judge from the soundings, being perfectly bare in many places on the bottom. The banks are for much of their extent black mud, forming salt meadows, the surfaces of which are about at mean high-water level. These mud banks stand almost perpendicular for a depth of 4 to 6 feet from the surface and then slope off toward the center of the channel until a point is reached where the rapidity of the current is sufficient to scour and carry away the mud, to be deposited in a bank in some eddy in one of the numerous sharp turns in the stream.

The current is comparatively rapid. Observation made for the purposes of this investigation show that its speed at half-tide varies from 1.25 to 2 miles per hour in the northern portion of the kill. A speed of ½ mile per hour is given by the authorities as sufficient to move fine sand or mud, and an examination of the sections on Map C will show great changes between the bottom by surveys of 1855, 1872, and 1886.

When the facts of the narrow, tortuous, changeable, and shallow channel are considered in connection with the enormous importance of this stream to the commerce centering on the harbor of New York, and as a link in the chain of inland navigation between the New England, Middle Atlantic, and Southern States, and the work it is doing and is destined to do as a carrier of the more bulky and low-priced products and manufactures of the country which could not survive the imposition of the lowest railroad tolls, a due appreciation may be formed of the need of zealous care and delicate study before the slightest obstruction in the way of bridge-piers be interposed to change the regimen of that channel and perhaps do irreparable damage to public and private interests representing millions of capital.

Map A will show the relative widths of channels of different depths in Arthur Kill in direct comparison with other tributary arms of New York Harbor, and Map B shows whole extent of the kill, with the depths of water at mean low tide.

Second. Commerce and comparison with commerce of other streams.

Through this narrow channel passes a commerce which, in aggregate of actual freight carried or measured tonnage, is surpassed but by very few of the great water ways of the world.

In the course of the discussion on the subject under consideration and in comparing the published statements put forth by the advocates and opposers of the bridge project, I find a misunderstanding as to the term "tonnage" which it is important should be corrected. The actual number of tons of freight carried is one thing and the tonnage of a port or body of water another. This second is the measured or registered capacity of the vessels entering and clearing. They may carry freight or be in ballast. Still a vessel registered or measuring 1,000 tons will be counted 1,000 tons on her entry into a port, or passing one way on a stream and 1,000 tons more when clearing or passing the other way, though she may not carry either time 500 tons of actual freight or may carry 3,000 tons. This last is the general acceptation of the term, as it would be an impossibility to compute with any degree of exactness the actual tonnage of the multifarious varieties of freight received and shipped from a port like New York, but the registered or measured tonnage of all vessels entered and cleared —in the foreign trade at least—is filed at the custom-house and can be readily obtained, and from these the tonnage statistics are prepared.

It is safe to say that the actual tons of freight carried in any one year will not exceed 50 per cent. of these figures of tonnage.

This is especially the case in the stream under consideration. The great bulk of the freight is inward bound, passing only one way and the vessel goes one way light.

Then a computation of actual freight tonnage does not give the stream the credit for carrying the many hundreds of tugs and tow-boats, aggregating thousands of tons in a year.

Thus a comparison of the freight tonnage of Arthur Kill with the registered tonnage of the Chicago River, Detroit River, or other bodies of water, as has been made, is deceiving.

I have, therefore, to the best of my ability, after careful inquiry, collated first the actual freight tonnage, and then the equivalent to the registered or measured tonnage.

The kill forms an important link in the chain of inland navigation which extends from Narragansett Bay to the Carolina sounds, and is made up in part of Long Island Sound, Kill von Kull, Arthur Kill, Delaware and Raritan Canal, Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, and the Southern canals terminating in Chesapeake Bay. But the commerce brought to Arthur Kill from these sources is but a portion of the total. On its shores and upon the shores of the Raritan River and Bay south of the proposed site of the bridge are established the terminal depots for heavy freights of two important railroads, namely, the Amboy division of the Pennsylvania Railroad at South Amboy and the Lehigh Valley Railroad at Perth Amboy, besides many extensive manufactories. North of the proposed site of the bridge and perhaps liable, only in a less degree, to be affected is the Elizabeth coal depot of the Central Railroad of New Jersey and more large manufactories.

A glance at the Map A—

Which I have before me—

will show that Arthur Kill offers the only sheltered channel between the mouth of the Raritan and the wharves of New York city. The freights to which this channel is mainly devoted are coal, pottery, and brick clays, and their manufactured products, fertilizers, ores, and the cheaper and bulkier chemical products. Still the total freight tonnage is so large that if all these classes be deducted from it there still remains an actual tonnage of higher class freight approximating 1,500,000 tons, or greater in quantity than the total receipts of grain in New York in the year 1885 over the New York Central and Pennsylvania lines or by the Erie Canal.

The annual coal tonnage carried through the kill from points south of the proposed site of the bridge is made up as follows:

	Tons.
Delaware and Raritan Canal	609,632
Pennsylvania Railroad from South Amboy	2,022,213
Lehigh Valley Railroad, Perth Amboy	1,852,643
Total	4,484,488

Of the above fully 90 per cent. passes through Arthur Kill, and would be affected by the building of a bridge, namely: 4,036,040 tons.

The above figures were obtained from the following sources: The Delaware and Raritan Canal, Hon. D. C. Chase, superintendent of towing; South Amboy, A. C. Davis, terminal and shipping agent Pennsylvania Railroad at that point; Lehigh Valley, Mr. James Donnelly, superintendent of New Jersey line.

The figures for Delaware and Raritan Canal and for Lehigh Valley Railroad are for year 1884. The South Amboy figures for 1885. Since writing this I have been able to compare the figures for 1885, and find no difference which can affect any deductions drawn from the above. To accommodate this trade alone required the passage of 52,000 vessels through the kill, representing a registered tonnage of eight and one-quarter millions, or 30,500 more vessels and 1,000,000 more tons than the total entries and clearances at Chicago in 1885.

To this portion of the coal trade, reaching the inner harbor of New York from points south of the proposed site of the bridge, must be added the coal received by rail and distributed from the Central Railroad of New Jersey terminus at Elizabethport, near the northern entrance to the sound.

This consisted in 1885 of 2,000,000 actual tons, required the passage one way of vessels representing a measured tonnage of 4,500,000.

Thus the total coal shipments from points on and through Arthur Kill reach the enormous figures of 6,484,488 tons, or equal to 20 per cent. of the whole annual product of anthracite.

The figures for the tonnage at Elizabethport were collected from estimates made by Mr. F. E. Saward, of the Coal Trade Journal, and Mr. P. Cole, of Elizabethport. The estimate of vessels and registered tonnage is carefully collated from personal observation and from inquiring of Mr. J. P. Cole, shipper of Elizabethport, and others having knowledge of the facts.

Turning from coal to the next largest single item of freight shipped through the sound, namely, pottery clay, and manufactures thereof. This is a trade to which cheap and unobstructed water transportation is vitally essential. Its statistics show annual actual tonnage of freight of 750,000 tons, requiring the passage through the sound of 10,000 vessels, representing a registered tonnage of about 2,000,000.

The following detailed statistics of commerce passing through Arthur Kill have been collected with great care; each statement therein made has been verified.

The figures for the Delaware and Raritan Canal are from the official records of that corporation. Those for South Amboy from Mr. A. C. Davis, terminal and shipping agent Pennsylvania Railroad at this point. The individual shippers on the Raritan, from information furnished by them, generally in the form of a letter signed, to Hon. D.C. Chase, to whom I am indebted for the original estimates.

The Lehigh Valley Railroad trade is from information given by Mr. James Donnelly, superintendent of New Jersey division Lehigh Valley Railroad, Perth Amboy, Mr. F. B. Morris, superintendent Bee Line Transportation Company, and Mr. Isaac L. Fisher, agent Perth Amboy Towing Line. The figures for the manufactures on Arthur Kill are in most cases given by the parties themselves either to Hon. D. C. Chase or collected by personal inquiry.

The Elizabethport shipments of coal are official figures from Mr. John P. Jones, accountant of the Anthracite Board of Control, Philadelphia. Other freights from careful inquiry among parties having knowledge of the facts, and verification and correction of statements already published in official reports.

In all cases of doubt the figures are believed to be below the truth, and it will be noticed that no estimate has been made of the unattached commerce through the sound which can not be credited to any particular interest, yet must in the course of a year amount to a large item. These statistics are believed by the writer to be as near correct as it is possible to obtain in such matters, and if any error exists its correction would increase the totals here given.

I have here a detailed statement of the commerce of Arthur Kill. It gives the point where the different articles of trade originate, the amount of tons, and the different firms in business along the kill, and the shippers from the different stations and termini. It is substantially correct in this essential, that it only gives absolute date, the figures for a great many thousands of tons of irregular freight not being counted.

Detailed statement of the commerce of Arthur Kill per annum, based on returns for 1883, 1884, and 1885.

Recapitulation of commerce affected by proposed bridge.

Originating south of proposed site of bridge:
Equivalent registered tonnage	15,772,175
Number of passages of vessels	69,451
Actual tons of freight carried	5,868,935
Value	$51,024,082
Originating north of proposed site of bridge:

To enable these figures to be appreciated it is well to compare with the statistics of other water ways, for example, Chicago Harbor, 1885:

Total registered tonnage, entries and clearances	7,287,236
Total number of vessels entered and cleared	21,542

The magnitude of this commerce differs little from that of the years 1883 and 1884.

Detroit River, season of 1883: 40,385 vessels; registered tonnage, 17,695,174 tons.

The report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army for 1874, page 587, contains report of board of engineers on project of a railroad bridge across the Detroit River, and contains a careful estimate, showing that in 1872 9,116,570 tons actual freight passed Detroit. These figures are significant, as the decision of the board was that a bridge could not be permitted. This subject I have fully considered under its appropriate head in this report.

The amount of coal passing Cincinnati on the Ohio annually is given at 75,000,000 bushels, equal to 2,519,311 tons. (See appendix to report of United States engineers on bridges on the Ohio River, Chief of Engineers' report, 1871, pages 429, &c.) This would represent a registered tonnage of probably 6,000,000 tons.

The tonnage of the Hudson River, including its feeding three canals, and covering the trade of forty-three cities and towns along its banks, was estimated by Captain Vosburgh, agent of Schuyler's towboat line, at 20,000,000 tons.

The total tons freight carried on the canals of New York State in 1884 was 5,009,488. (See report of board of railroad commissioners State of New York for 1884, volume 1, page xi.)

The entries and clearances at the port of London in 1884 were 74,105 vessels, representing registered tonnage of 18,549,889 tons.

The net tonnage of the Suez Canal, 1883, was 5,775,861. (See report of Professor J. E. Nourse, United States Navy, transmitted to the Senate June 26, 1884.)

These comparisons show the rank of Arthur Kill as a water way.

The following table gives the actual passages of vessels, passing the foot of Livingston street, Elizabethport, in the twenty-four hours, between 6 p. m. of April 9 and 6 p. m. of April 10, 1886. All vessels not passing the proposed site of bridge have been eliminated:

These observation were taken at a dull season of the year and can not fairly be considered as giving even an average of the daily movement though the sound. It will be noted that the great proportion of heavy tows passed in the hours of darkness.

The president of the Pittsburgh Coal Exchange, in a communication to the board of United States engineers appointed, under authority of an act of Congress approved July 11, 1870, to examine into the effect the bridges of the Ohio were having upon the navigation of that stream, says (see Appendix B, board's report. Report Chief of Engineers, 1871, pages 429 et seq.):

The losses by collision with the piers of bridges spanning the Ohio River ($198,692), heavy as it is, constitutes but a small item of the aggregate loss resulting from said obstruction. The great loss sustained is by detention arising from the necessity of landing our towboats and waiting for daylight, not daring to run the narrow channel ways at night.

"The narrow channel ways" he speaks of are from three to four hundred feet wide and not obstructed by draw-pier and fenders, as would be the case in a draw-bridge, and this draw-bridge has but 200 feet clear opening. The coal fleets carry about the same number of tons of coal as the tows on the Arthur Kill and generally contain less number of boats.

The time required to open and close the Raritan draw, at the present day the longest in the world, is on an average about four and one-half minutes. This draw is for a single track, and moves, the engineer in charge informs me, exceedingly smoothly. The proposed draw will be for double track at least twice the weight. If the time of passing vessels through be considered, a fair average will be fifteen minutes, and some tows and vessels will require more time, some less, depending upon wind and tide. On this assumption, applying the figures of the last table, the draw would have been open and closed for the twenty-fours hours selected for periods as follows:

Open from—	Open.	Closed from—	Closed.

Thus in this twenty-four hours the draw would have to keep open ten times for twenty minutes or more; three times, thirty minutes or more; twice, forty-five minutes or more, and twice over an hour; or if the same average be kept up for a month of twenty-six working days, we will have two hundred and sixty times twenty minutes or more; seventy-eight times, thirty minutes or more; fifty-two times, forty-five minutes or more; fifty-two times, one hour or more.

One of the arguments advanced by the board of United States engineers against bridging the Detroit River (see report already referred to) was the impracticability of passing this commerce of the river through a draw, at the same time accommodating the railroad traffic, and in support of this proposition they show that in June, 1873, the draw would have had to be open three hundred and sixty-one times for twenty minutes or more; ninety-three times, for thirty minutes or more; twenty times, for forty-five minutes or more; once for one hour and fifteen minutes.

A comparison of these figures will show that the objection raised to the Detroit River bridge applies with greater force to the proposed structure. And, furthermore, there will be no difficulty in my opinion in showing that during the busy season the movements of vessels through the kill is more than double the example here given.

In such a case it would become a serious question which should give way, the shipping or the railroad interest, for one must suffer serious loss and inconvenience.

I have here a statement in connection with this matter of the different buildings and manufactories along the line of the kills, the location being such, so contiguous to New York, and the land being surprisingly cheap and transportation so easy to distribute the products of large works, that a great deal of it has been taken up for that purpose.

Third. Manufacturing and riparian interests on the Jersey shore and grants made by the State, with improvements made under said grants.

Map B will show the location of the State grants of riparian lands along the whole extent of the kill.

The following are the grantees and the extent of frontage granted, measured along the exterior line for solid filling.

Or about 5½ miles.

The advantage which this water front offers for manufactories requiring large space and cheap land is evident. An open channel within easy distance of the great business center of New York, and also one of the main lines of water communication of the Union in front, and in the rear the New York and Long Branch Railroad connecting with all trunk lines.

The following manufacturing and business enterprises, some very extensive, have been established upon the shores mainly during the last ten or twelve years:

The Refiners' Export Oil Company, Perth Amboy: 8 buildings; employ about 25 men; have 200 feet of bulkhead and wharf; New York office, 46 Harrison street.

Roessaler & Hasslacher, manufacturers and importers of chemicals: 2 large brick buildings, 100 feet of bulkhead, and employ about 6 men: New York office, 56 Pine street.

John Hall & Son, lumber dealers, Perth Amboy: 450 feet of bulkheaded water front.

S. B. Greacen, machine-shop: Use portion of I. Hall & Son's water fronts; have 1 brick building.

W. G. Underhill, Perth Amboy: 100 feet of bulkheaded water front.

Pennsylvania Railroad Company, Perth Amboy and Woodbridge Railroad: 125 feet of dock.

Ashland Emery Works, Perth Amboy: 3 buildings; 150 feet of wharf.

C. W. Boynton, manufacturer of fire-brick: 5 buildings; 40 feet of improved water front on Staten Island Sound, 150 feet on Woodbridge Creek.

Henry Maures, manufacturer of fire-brick: 10 buildings; 400 feet of wharf on Woodbridge Creek; New York office, 418 East Twenty-second street.

Perth Amboy Terra Cotta Works: 20 buildings; 50 feet of wharf.

Lehigh Valley Railroad have extensive terminal facilities; 5 large wharves and coal piers, and improvements valued at $900,000.

William Clark & Co., manufacturers of chemicals: Buildings cover an area of about 3½ acres; 5 piers, 64 feet by 300 feet, and 1,000 feet of water front.

Standard Chemical Company: 10 large buildings; 475 feet of improved water front; employs 70 men; have spent about $3,000,000 in improvements. Office, 71 Wall street, New York.

Russel Coe, manufacturer of fertilizers: 5 buildings; 550 feet of improved water front.

A. Mitchell, manufacturer of fertilizers: 1 building; 100 feet of improved water front.

New Jersey Extraction Works and State Chemical Company: Several large buildings; 350 feet of improved water front.

Bowker Fertilizer Company: Buildings covering a space of about 3½ acres; 250 feet of improved water front.

The Fire-Proof Building Company: Several buildings and 350 feet of improved water front.

From the proposed site of the bridge north to the bridge of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey over Newark Bay the New Jersey shore of the sound is improved and the seat of busy industry. This land is valued at from $50 to $100 per running foot along shore line unimproved. The agent of the Baltimore and New York Railroad Company paid $72 per foot front for the site of the proposed westerly abutment of this bridge. The land is entirely unimproved—salt marsh; land similarly situated can be purchased for $50 per foot front.

The terminal of the Central Railroad of New Jersey with its 13 coal wharves, 5 freight docks, represent an actual value of improved property of upward of $1,000,000.

The enormous works of the Singer Manufacturing Company, employing at different times 1,800 to 5,000 hands, with a large improved water front acquired at great cost, lies north of the coal docks.

All these interests are affected by the proposed bridge.

Fourth. Proposed project of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company as far as developed.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company's agents have located and marked upon the ground with permanent stakes a center line of railroad crossing the sound a short distance north of Bay Way—Elizabethport. The line is shown upon Map C, and plainly designated.

On the Staten Island shore the Rapid Transit Company have purchased several large tracts of land, one in particular of about 43 acres, running along the shore from a point about 200 feet north of the proposed bridge-site to Howland Hook, the northwestern extremity of Staten Island. This tract, I am informed, was purchased of Mayor Grace, of New York, and the consideration was about $1,000 per acre.

Up to ten days ago they had not acquired title to the land upon which the Staten Island end of the bridge would abut, the owner holding it at a very stiff figure.

The plans for the bridge as far as developed contemplate a double track iron draw-bridge with a draw span of two 200-foot clear openings, which will make the draw about 470 feet long, and the heaviest at present in the world. At either side of the draw are to be shorter spans. The piers and abutments are to be of stone carried down to bottom, and will probably be built on the solid rock in a caisson. The grade is to be 30 feet above mean low water. This construction will necessitate the building of a fender pier for the pivot pier of the draw at least 470 feet long and 45 feet wide, with guide fender on outer sides of the openings probably 250 feet long. The position of the bridge with these fenders and the relative area subtracted by them from the area of the channel is shown on the Map C. It will be seen that without regard to the effects the piers may have in changing the regimen of the bottom of the channel by causing scouring or deposits, these structures must certainly cause great inconvenience to navigation. The plot of the plan of bridge is made from such information as I could obtain as to the general plan of the structure, and the position of the different spans, draw openings, piers, and fenders are as usually is the practice in structures of a similar class. Final plans might change the position of the draw openings slightly, lengthen or shorten some of the lesser spans, change the angle of the fenders, or differ from the plot in small details, but these changes could have no effect upon the deductions we desire to prove, namely: The injury the structure would inflict upon shipping. Given the lines as located and the required dimension of draw, no variation from the plot as shown on Map C could lessen the disadvantageous effect of the structure upon the navigation interests.

Fifth. Regimen of channel in the vicinity of proposed site of bridge, as determined by soundings and current observations.

Map C shows a careful survey of Arthur Kill from a point just south of Buckwheat Island to the foot of Livingston street, Elizabethport, plotted in a scale of 200 feet to 1 inch. The soundings are shown in feet and tenths and refer to mean low water—the same plan as was adopted by the United States engineers in 1872. The position of each sounding has been accurately located by triangulation from instruments on the shore. The sections plotted on the map are on a horizontal scale of 60 feet to 1 inch and a vertical scale of 10 feet to an inch. The lines of soundings are the same as those used in 1855 by the United States Coast Survey, and in 1872 by United States engineers under direction of General Newton, and the sections show the exact changes which have taken place between these dates.

It will be noted by an inspection of these sections that there have been many changes in the bed of the stream between these periods. The general tendency is to scour out and deepen the channel on the New York side and shoal on the New Jersey side. This is no doubt due in a great measure to the retardation of the tidal flow by the erection of piers and docks jutting out into the stream on the Jersey shore; but while this tendency is to be noted another fact shows, which I deem of great importance in considering the question of the effect upon the regimen of the channel likely to follow the erection of piers, there has been a regular scouring with consequent enlargement of the sectional area in the narrow portion of the kill covered by the four northermost sections and a regular deposit at the points where the channel widens in passing Buckwheat Island. The channel, 12 feet deep at low water as shown by the Coast Survey of 1885 between Buckwheat Island and the Jersey shore, has entirely disappeared, and in its place is a mud flat almost dry at low water.

I am informed that this is partially accounted for by the fact that a contractor in the employ of the Central Railroad of New Jersey deposited the silt excavated from the coal-dock slips at Elizabethport in this channel. This may have hastened the formation of the bank, but the natural deposits still go on, the current in this reach being much less swift than in the narrow reaches north, and the result is that the ebb tide deposits the scour from above as soon as its velocity is decreased beyond a certain point. The flood tide no doubt carries its share of the scour and deposits it on the flats near the corner stake at the junction of the waters of Kill von Kull, Newark Bay, and Arthur Kill. To counteract this last the United States Government have erected a dike at a large expense and produced a swifter current and deeper channel.

The general directions of the flood and ebb currents are shown upon the map by arrow-heads. The general direction of the flood current is: Coming up through the channel between Staten Island and Buckwheat Island it is a true current to the point at Sections XI and XIV, opposite the New Jersey Extraction Works, here it is deflected and divided, that portion nearest the center of the channel continuing in almost a direct line diagonally across the kill to the mouth of Morse's Creek where it forms an eddy and is greatly retarded, then passes out and is deflected diagonally across toward the Staten Island shore, gathering rapidity as it joins the other body. The portion of the flood in the deepest part of the channel opposite the points XI and XIV and within 100 feet of the Staten Island shore sweeps swiftly around the point and continues in almost a straight line to the point just north of Old Place Creek; here it is deflected toward the Jersey shore for about 600 to 1,000 feet and then continues on in a direction almost parallel to the New York shore to the foot of Livingston street.

The ebb current coming around the northwestern point of Staten Island is deflected diagonally across the kill to the mouth of Elizabeth River; from thence it bends toward the New York side in almost a direct line to the mouth of Old Place Creek; thence in almost a direct line to the point at Line XI and XIV, which it passes in the continuation of this line until the center of the channel is reached; thence in a true current directly through the passage between Buckwheat and Staten Islands. Both the ebb and flood currents cross the center line of the proposed bridge at an angle of about seventy-nine degrees. The mean velocity of the current passing the line of the proposed bridge is 2 miles per hour.

Sixth. Probable changes in regimen of channel from erection of piers in the stream.

Any sudden reduction in the area of cross-section of a stream is sure to result in a disturbance of the fixed regimen.

The same volume of water passes through any of the sections of a river channel at the same time. Where this is not the case, we have falls and rapids, which are caused by certain cross-sections being of much less area than the others, and the water must increase in velocity in order that the same volume shall pass. Nature here comes into play, and the increased velocity produces a scour of the smaller sections and a deposit in the larger sections until the equilibrium is restored.

If the larger section be narrow and deep, such deposits may do no harm, as the area can be lessened without encroaching upon useful depth; but if the larger section be broad and shallow, as is usually the case, the deposits form bars and shoals. An inspection of the sections on Map C shows this action has been going on to a certain extent in Arthur Kill, near the site of proposed bridge. The erection of piers under the most favorable circumstances will reduce the cross-section of the stream, on Line IV and VII, at the proposed point of crossing, from 10,053 square feet to 8,565 square feet, or 1,488 square feet; or, in order for the stream to regain its present regimen, this section must be scoured out to a depth of about 2 feet, and the material thus scoured deposited at some point where the stream widens and the velocity of current decreases.

If the point of deposit could be controlled a reduction of the area of the large sections by a reduction of width only might be of advantage, but nothing is so capricious as a stream running through banks such as we find at the kills, and the deposit is as likely to be directly in the channel as elsewhere.

The portion carried north by the flood will certainly be deposited on the flats near corner stake and add to the shoal which the United States Government has spent already $92,204.62 in counteracting.

Furthermore the channel will be likely to be affected seriously by another cause resulting from the proposed erection. Arthur Kill at present is remarkably free from ice in winter. The strong current and unobstructed water way with the open waters of New York Bay and Raritan Bay at either end tend to this result. During the most severe winters it is seldom closed but for a few days. With the erection of the piers this will certainly not be the case. All examples show that the piers will hold the ice which forms and prevent it being carried out of the stream, and result in closing the sound to navigation all winter.

The formation of fixed ice in the wide and shallow reaches will be followed by more rapid shoaling, the ice itself assisting in retarding the flow and also usually carrying and gathering solid matter on its under side, which is deposited in the spring. Examples illustrating these facts can be seen in Newark Bay and the Passaic and Hackensack Rivers. The tidal currents of these streams are naturally very strong. Without bridges to hold back the ice it is likely navigation could be continued throughout the winter, but they are now closed tightly from the first hard frost until the ice rots in the spring.

The annual winter closing of the kill would, of course, result in driving all commerce going through to and from the Amboys to the outside route. When this is the case for the few odd days in winter now, the towing companies give notice to owners of barges, &c., that they will not assume responsibility for extra risk caused by going outside of Staten Island. It will thus be understood that the closing of this water route for a portion of the year will revolutionize the trade passing through it.

Another important consideration to be taken into account is:

The meeting place of the tides of the Kill von Kull and Arthur Kill is now at corner stake. Such places always show a tendency to shoal, and this has been the case here. The expenditure of the United States Government just mentioned was to secure by means of dikes a channel through this shoal of 13 feet at low water.

It is a grave question whether the retardation of the flood current of Arthur Kill caused by the proposed piers may not shift the point of meeting of the tides farther south and west, in which case shoals would be formed directly opposite the busiest portion of the wharf front of Elizabethport, where land is now worth $100 per foot front.

Seventh. Increase of cost of water transportation imposed by necessity of passing the draw.

This is a vital part of the opposition to the construction of the bridge as proposed in the bill.

The greater bulk of the freight tonnage of this stream is carried in tows made up of from thirty to seventy boats and barges towed by one large towboat or two tugs.

I will state that these towboats are not the little things described by the Senator from Maine, which might let down their smoke-stacks conveniently whenever they chose to pass an obstruction, but they are great, powerful steamers, constructed especially for pulling the 10,000 tons of freight necessary for the vessels to carry.

The amount of actual freight tonnage in one of these tows varies from six to ten thousand tons of coal. Tows vary in length from 1,100 feet to 2,150 feet and in actual width from 60 to 125 feet. The tows of the Delaware and Raritan Canal are made up and leave New Brunswick on the ebb tide in the Raritan.

This has always been the practice, the object having been to meet the flood tide at the junction of the Raritan and Arthur Kill and make use of it on the passage of the kill. Before the erection of the Raritan draw on the New York and Long Branch Railroad, it was usual to anchor at Sandy Point, the mouth of the Raritan, and wait for the flood. But the erection of the draw-bridge compelled the fleets to anchor above the draw, a process fraught with much risk and damage to pass a fleet through the Raritan draw, 200 feet clear opening with the current. The fleets, therefore, now wait above the draw until slack-water and pass through there, taking the fair tide up the kill.

But what would be the effect upon this fleet if the proposed structure be erected? It will be just as dangerous to pass the proposed draw on a fair tide as to pass the draw in the Raritan. Therefore the fleet instead of having, as now, a clear and unobstructed passage to the wharves of New York will have to anchor again below the proposed bridge, await a turn in the tide, and pass through the draw against it. The same procedure must be followed by tows from Perth and South Amboy, they leaving those places on a favorable tide. This bridge would therefore result in an actual loss of one tide, or six hours, to every tow on the kill.

The time of a Delaware and Raritan tow-boat is worth $12 per hour. The time of the Perth Amboy towing line tug is worth $85 per day, or for six hours $42.50. A fleet of thirty-two boats from Perth Amboy will be towed by two tugs. The additional cost in tugs alone will be $85, and for the Delaware and Raritan boat $72, and this is entirely independent of the time of canal-boats, barges, or lighters and their crews. If this item for a fleet of forty boats be taken at $3 per boat (a very low estimate), we have a loss of $192 in the case of a Delaware and Raritan tow. Such a fleet will average 200 tons per boat or 8,000 tons in all; thus the added cost will be 2.4 cents per ton, or on the 4,000,000 tons of coal annually conveyed through the sound the large tax of $96,000.

But this is not the actual or worse result to the floating commerce of the kill which is likely to follow the erection of a draw-bridge as proposed.

The estimates of losses last given are based upon the premises that a tow of the dimensions now common to these waters could be passed through the proposed draw opening.

I have endeavored to show upon Map C the position occupied by one of these tows at the site of the bridge, also the bridge and draw openings. The long flexible fleet is shown contorted as it is at that point by the action of the ebb current. A glance at the map will show that some difficulty will be experienced in passing such a body safely through an opening 200 feet wide into which the currents beat at an oblique angle. Again, the tows on the sound usually run together closely following each other, the same object (to take advantage of the favorable tide) being common to all. Maps A and C will show that the sound is not a place where such a fleet could lay to or anchor without blocking up the narrow passage to the injury and delay of all other navigation.

It would be impossible to stop three or four of these fleets to await a change in the tide without absolutely blocking up the channel. This is proven often in time of sudden fogs upon the sound requiring tows to anchor. The unwieldy mass of the fleet becomes strung across the channel, and for the time being offers great obstruction to or practically stops all other navigation. Under the head of "Commerce," a quotation was made from the president of the Pittsburgh Coal Exchange, alluding to the tying up of coal fleets on the Ohio, and the great expense and risk attending the operation, but the Ohio is several times as wide as this stream, and the current is always in one direction.

There seems to be no other opinion among boatmen but that the erection of the proposed bridge will compel the curtailment of the fleet. Mr. Isaac L. Fisher, agent of the Perth Amboy Towing Line and a boatman of long experience in these waters, estimates that the usual fleet of that line of thirty-two boats towed by two tugs must be cut down to eight fleets, of four boats and one tug each, so that the draw-opening can be safely passed with a favorable tide.

The additional cost would be $510 for the six added tugs. The fleet of thirty-two boats would carry on an average 7,000 tons coal; therefore the added cost per ton is 7.3 cents, or on the 4,000,000 tons of coal annually carried past the proposed bridge site, $292,000.

The actual price charged for towing such a fleet from Perth Amboy to New York is now about 3 cents per ton, so that the cost of towage would be more than tripled.

The above estimates only apply to large fleets. As to the single sailing vessels and tows of one, two, or three boats, which form no mean portion of the commerce of the kill, with wind and tide against her, it is doubtful if a sailing vessel could beat through the narrow opening of the draw at all, and if it were possible the risks of collision would be greater than the master would be warranted in assuming.

For a number of years it has been the practice on the Charles River, Massachusetts, to charge an additional freight rate of 3 cents per ton of coal per draw-bridge passed through.

This practice is mentioned in a letter from Messrs. H. and A. Morse & Co., wholesale coal-dealers, of Boston, to Maj. Charles W. Raymond, United States Engineers, printed on page 514 of the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1884, and commented upon by Major Raymond in his report on page 513, preceding. It is also confirmed by Mr. Smith W. Haines, of Jersey City, who has for many years been interested in the chartering of vessels for coal to Eastern points. The draw-bridge openings of the Charles River are narrow as compared with the one proposed.

In addition to these charges must be taken into account the actual losses by collision with piers or fenders which it is impossible to prevent and which must certainly have the effect of raising the premium of marine insurance on vessels trading through the sound. The actual losses from these causes at five bridges on the Ohio are given on the authority of the Pittsburgh Coal Exchange in a report to the Chief of Engineers, and printed with his report 1871 Appendix B, page 429, as being the sum of $198,692. The period covered was for one bridge six years and seven months, for the other four less than two years.

These bridges are all built at a height of 70 to 90 feet above low-water level, with channel spans of from 300 to 400 feet. The coal fleets consist of from sixteen to eighteen coal barges or ten coal boats, and the freight tonnage is from 7,000 to 9,000 tons.

Taking all these facts into consideration, I think it safe to estimate that the erection of a bridge as proposed will impose a tax of at least 6 cents per ton upon all classes of freight carried past the draw, or a total annual tax approximating $500,000.

The claim has been made that the elevation of 30 feet above low water proposed for the bridge will enable the greater portion of the commerce of the kill to pass under it. This claim I think on examination untenable. The top of smokestacks of tugs are usually more than 30 feet from water line, some of the towboats being large steamers 60 feet above water.

A tow seldom is made up without containing several lighters, sloops, or schooners with masts over 70 feet high, and they will be scattered through the tow from one end to the other so the draw can not be closed until the whole tow has passed, and the height of the floor can not affect the main obstruction. the piers in the channel, and the narrow channel way. No opening less than 450 feet will give the proper freedom to navigation now engaged, and a floor 70 feet above high water would still shut out some thousands of vessels per year unless a draw-span be provided also.

The Steubenville bridge over the Ohio had a channel span of 300 feet and was 90 feet above low water. The board of engineers already referred to, consisting of General G. K. Warren, Godfrey Weitzel, and Col. William E. Merrill, recommend its widening at a cost of $200,414.50, and say: "This bridge has been a serious hinderance to navigation since it was built. It is unquestionable that bridges over the Ohio, though a public necessity, are a source of danger and loss to the navigation interest." (See report Chief of Engineers 1871, pages 429, et seq.)

The principal traffic incommoded by this bridge was coal, amounting annually at that period to about 2,500,000 tons.

It is claimed that the railroad traffic to be accommodated by the bridge will be of so much more importance to the community at large that the result of its erection will result in a net gain.

The total receipts of principal staples at New York in the year 1885 were:

	Tons.	Value.
Flour	528,536	$19,664,505
Grain and meal	2,220,000	66,819,557
Cotton	256,000	54,497,200
Petroleum	1,456,429	29,250,000
Total	4,460,965	170,231,262

NOTE.—The quantities are taken from the Journal of Commerce for January 1, 1886. The computations are made from usual market quantities to gross tons. The values are computed on average market quotations for 1885.

Of the above 23.63 per cent. of the grain and flour is delivered by canal, 92 per cent. of the cotton by water, and a great portion of the petroleum by pipe line. I am informed also by Mr. Charles Sterling, superintendent of the National Storage Company, that petroleum should be left out of any calculation of probable freights over the proposed bridge, as it is not likely any quantity will ever be shipped by that line. These being subtracted we have, tons, 2,341,428, value, $70,407,835, on the supposition that the freight is evenly divided among the six trunk lines. The Baltimore and Ohio may expect to carry over the bridge 390,278 tons, valued at $11,734,639. If miscellaneous freights be added, say 600,000 tons, valued at $20,000,000—eastward freights, not including coal.

Eighth. Effect upon value of water-front property.

The effect of the erection of the proposed bridge upon the value of water-front and riparian property along the New Jersey shore will be to depress it.

Investigation into the effect the erection of the East River bridge has had upon the value of the water-front property east of it shows that the actual general depression has been at least 30 per cent. This depression is believed to be permanent by parties familiar with the subject.

This question was the subject of examination by the committee on commerce and navigation of the New York Assembly in 1879; some 789 printed pages of testimony was taken, and the committee reported that it was clearly established "that the bridge when completed will obstruct the navigation of the port of New York to the extent of requiring all vessels with masts above the height of 135 feet in passing the bridge to lower some portion of their masts. That the owners of dock property above the bridge have been deterred from making requisite modern improvements to retain this shipping. That the lessees of this dock property were unwilling to take leases, except from year to year, unless at greatly reduced rates, and that orders have in some cases been sent to their agents by owners of vessels loading in foreign ports for New York to have conditions inserted in the charters of these vessels not to discharge above this bridge unless all charges, damages, and loss should be borne by the consignee; and as a consequence warehouses and property fronting on the East River have considerably depreciated in value, and the tendency has been to divert business from this property to warehouses on the Brooklyn shore below the bridge."

On these points Michael Coleman, deputy tax commissioner and city appraiser, testified:

"That the water front from the bridge to Twenty-third street, which had been worth in ordinary times $7,000,000, had been depreciated 30 per cent.

"That the city had met this depreciation by reducing the valuation for taxation of the principal storehouses from 20 to 40 per cent. That same class of property below the bridge had not depreciated.

"That he had found the property on the Jersey shore and the east side of the Hudson as far as Seventy-second street increased as much in proportion as the decrease on the East River above the bridge."

Vernon H. Brown, at present agent of the Cunard Steamship Company, testified that he had knowledge of a clause being inserted on charter parties forbidding vessels to go above the bridge; had himself sent such instructions, and would not have a vessel go above the bridge if he could help it.

Capt. Ambrose Snow testifies that the bridge would injure the warehouses above it, and was a great detriment to the free use of the river, and injured the harbor and commerce of New York.

Richard C. Wiet, employed by the Standard Oil Company, testified that the building of the bridge had injured the Hunter's Point works of the company; that owners of large vessels as a favor ask that the vessels be sent to Weehawken for oil; that the business at Weehawken was thus increased at the expense of Hunter's Point.

To verify these statements made in 1879 and discover whether the depreciation then claimed had been permanent, I have conversed with Mr. A. B. Miller, warehouse owner, 88 Pearl street, and the plaintiff in a suit in the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York against the mayor and aldermen of the city and the trustees of the Brooklyn bridge, and a gentleman perfectly familiar with the subject.

I also called upon Capt. Ambrose Snow, president of the Board of Trade and Transportation, and one of the best-known merchants and ship-owners of the city of New York. Both gentlemen assured me that the experience of the seven years since 1879 had corroborated the testimony here given; that the depreciation in real estate along the shore front above the bridge was fully 30 per cent. Mr. D. A. Nash, secretary of the board of commissioners of pilots, and Mr. Francis W. Houghton, secretary of the Maritime Association, also confirmed these statements, and there is no trouble in proving them by overwhelming testimony. While this has been the effect of the East River bridge, 1,500 feet clear span and 135 feet in height, a nearer example to the land under consideration may be found in the Newark Bay bridge of the Central Railroad of New Jersey. The lands along the shore north and south of this bridge are similar as to all natural advantages.

Before the bridge was built a channel 7 to 8 feet deep at low water extended from the coal-docks of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey along the shore to the Newark Bay light-house. This channel is shown on the Coast Survey map of 1855, and witnesses can be produced who will testify to having taken vessels to Newark from Arthur Kill by that route. This channel has entirely disappeared above the bridge, and the reason can be found in causes chargeable to the bridge. Lands north of the bridge are worth not more than $200 per acre, while not 300 feet away land south of the bridge fronting on the water are worth unimproved $15,000 per acre.

These facts were well shown out in the testimony of Mr. Charles W. Noyes, taken in the railroad-tax cases of 1882 and 1884.

Information derived from owners of manufacturing establishments along the sound show that they have well-grounded fears of the regular closing of the channel in winter by ice if the bridge be built. The free access to their wharves in all seasons is a necessity; one company maintain a boat solely for the purpose of breaking up the floating ice.

If the sound is closed for the winter many flourishing industries must go elsewhere, and the shore-front, which now offers the best facilities to such interests upon a main water way, will become of far less value, and the water way will sink to the position of a canal.

Ninth. Action of Government engineers upon question of bridging other navigable channels, and comparisons with the channel in question.

The only other navigable channels under control of the United States Government, at all comparable with Arthur Kill in magnitude and importance of commercial interest involved, upon which the question of the erection of bridges has been raised, are the East River, the Detroit River, and the Hudson.

The East River has been bridged with a span of 1,500 feet and 135 feet high. The results to the shipping interests of the port of New York it can not be denied have been detrimental. Nothing but the necessity for communications between the vast population of the two cities of New York and Brooklyn can justify or compensate for the damage inflicted upon the harbor.

Attempts have been made to bridge the Detroit River at Detroit and other points, but all have been successfully defeated by the navigation interests of the Northern lakes. This is also the case with all projects to bridge the Hudson below Albany.

The railroads interested in bridging the Detroit River were the Grand Trunk, Canada Southern, the Michigan Central, and the Great Western. These roads are compelled to ferry all their freights and passengers across this stream.

In the report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, for 1874, page 587, will be found a report of a board of engineers, consisting of General G. K. Warren, General C. B. Comstock, General Godfrey Hertzel, Col. W. E. Merrill, Capt. W. R. Livermore on the question of briding the channel between Lakes Huron and Erie.

The claim was made by the railroad companies that as a draw-bridge on the Chicago River accommodated forty-three thousand seven hundred and thirty-five vessels in 1868, a draw could easily pass the commerce of the Detroit River; but the board remarked that the Chicago River can not be compared to this great highway, there being no current. Tugs rarely take through more than one vessel at a time, and sometimes two tugs to one vessel; and the sides of the stream are docked, serving as fenders.

The average width of the Saint Clair River, navigable for boats of 16 feet draught, was 2,000 feet.

Nine million one hundred and sixteen thousand five hundred and seventy tons actual freight passed Detroit in 1872.

The observations of the board in regard to number of times the draw would have to be kept open and the periods of time in a month have been given under the head of "Commerce of the Kill." The president of the Michigan Central Railroad Company proposed that the draw be closed for thirty times a day for a space of ten minutes each time, to allow of the passage of trains; but this the board considered could not be allowed, due regard being had to navigation.

At that time a company had been formed to construct a tunnel under the river. The estimated cost was $2,650,000. Considerable work has since been done upon this project, but the cost overrunning the estimates and unforseen difficulties arising, the work has been abandoned for the present.

From the foregoing it will be seen that these conditions are not unlike the conditions existing on Arthur Kill with the important differences, that at Detroit four trunk lines of railroad are completely cut, with no possible way of making connection except by a tunnel or bridge. Here, we have one proposed trunk line, which out of many miles of water front available at the owner's price, prefers to select this route to the detriment of other more important interests. The Western stream is 2,000 feet wide, Arthur Kill but 700.

No fear is expressed of shoaling the channel of the Detroit River by the erection of piers, while there is great danger from this source at Arthur Kill. The Detroit River is closed by ice some months in the year. Arthur Kill is open all the year round. The registered tonnage of both streams differs slightly and in favor of the kill.

The conclusion of the board is summed up as follows:

First. That a bridge giving clear headway of 150 feet and clear span of 400 feet would not seriously impede navigation.

Second. No bridge giving passage to vessels by draw alone, with draw span at present practicable, can be permitted without serious injury to navigation.

Third. That a bridge giving a clear opening of 700 feet from April 1 to December 1, with two draw openings 100 feet in the clear, and with the permanent foundations of its movable piers 18 feet below lowest stage of water, will not be a serious obstruction to navigation.

Fourth. For the reasons heretofore given, although the question has not been directly referred to it, the board deemed the crossing of the river by tunnels the only unobjectionable method, and from all the information they have obtained think a tunnel at Detroit or Stony Island is by no means impracticable at a cost not so great as to debar its construction.

The United States engineers in the Ohio uniformly demand clear spans of at least 400 feet.

Viewing the subject under consideration in the light of these decisions it is difficult to see how the proposed structure over Arthur Kill can receive the sanction of the United States engineers.

Tenth. Other means of crossing the stream which will not interfere with navigaton interests.

There is no good reason except the cost of the work why this stream should not be crossed by a tunnel under its bed. The underlying rock, as shown by the State geological survey, is sandstone. The tunnel need not in its deepest part be more than 50 feet below low water. It could be constructed in an open cut, section by section, in caissons, and the arch protected from anchors or other weights which might be dropped upon it. The grades to reach such a tunnel would not be excessive.

In comparison with the Detroit tunnel, the Hudson River tunnel, or the tunnel just completed under the bed of the Mersey between Liverpool and Birkenhead, the work would be child's play and the cost a mere fraction.

The new Mersey tunnel shows the jealous care which Liverpool exercises over her harbor and water communications.

This is 3 miles long, excavated through sandstone rock.

The item of cost should not be allowed to come into consideration.

The injury that would be inflicted upon commerce at present and for all time by the proposed bridge is so much more in actual money value than the highest possible estimate that could be made for a tunnel, that such arguments should be thrown aside.

If it is necessary for the general good for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to have its terminal on Staten Island, the additional cost should not stand in the way of protecting interests as important as these now threatened by the proposed structure.

All these facts are respectfully submitted.

They are all susceptible of legal proof when necessary.

Certain points may require to be enlarged upon as developments arise in the discussion, but I believe the whole ground is covered in its engineering aspect.

Very respectfully,

E. W. HARRISON, Civil Engineer.

Mr. President, the people who use this passage between Raritan and New York have grown up on it. It was the first great means of communication originally between New Amsterdam and the settlements to the south and west of it, the other means being the Hudson River to the north and west of it. Before the days of railroads the great transportation companies that furnished all the products either imported or manufactured in New York and in the New England States and that brought any return they could from the West, used this line of communication; and the very people who are to-day engaged in the towing and who own these steamers and vessels are the successors of the men of one hundred years ago who opened up this first line of communication to the West. They grew from their small commencements until to-day some of them are large, powerful corporations and have a great deal of money invested in their business.

I repeat, as far as the railroad companies are concerned there is no opposition from any railroad company in New Jersey or Pennsylvania of which I have any knowledge who have ever spoken to me about it except that which comes from affiliated companies owning vessels on this stream and which they think they have a natural right to navigate. While they will not object to a tunnel or they will not object to a fair bridge, they can not see how Congress will deliberately strike at their rights, their capital, their earnings, their savings, for a road which has no existence in fact and which has never turned a spadeful of the soil of New Jersey to make it.

I have listened with some interest to the argument of the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Oregon on the legal side of this question. I have carefully looked at it, and without the technical knowledge necessary to enable me to compete with those gentlemen in a matter of that kind, I have prepared a brief which I think will show that there are two sides even to that case.

This bill, in express terms, confers upon a New Jersey corporation, the Baltimore and New York Railroad Company—that is, the company which owns the small 6 miles of road on paper in the State of New Jersey, to which I referred, and which never has done any work—the franchise of constructing and maintaining a railway bridge across the Staten Island Sound, that is to say, both within the boundaries and across the territory of the State of New Jersey and within the boundaries and across the territory of the State of New York; and also confers upon a New York corporation (the Staten Island Rapid Transit Company) the same franchise. Whether the franchise is joint and only exercisable by both, or several, and exercisable by either, is immaterial, as it is beyond the power of Congress to confer either the joint or several franchise upon both or either of these corporations.

The Federal and the State Legislatures are separate and independent sovereignties within the respective limits of their constitutional powers, and stand, within those limits, in the same relation to each other as do the several State Legislatures. Neither can exercise or limit the constitutional powers of the other, and it is decisively adjudged by the Federal Supreme Court that the Legislature of one State can not confer franchises upon a corporation created by another State:

It is true that a corporation by the name and style of the plaintiffs (the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company) appears to have been chartered by the States of Indiana and Ohio, clothed with the same capacities and powers, and intended to accomplish the same objects, and it is spoken of in the laws of the States as one corporate body, exercising the same powers and fulfilling the same duties in both States. Yet it has no legal existence in either State except by the law of the State. And neither State could confer on it a corporate existence in the other, nor add to or diminish the powers there to be exercised. It may, indeed, be composed of and represent, under the corporate name, the same natural persons, but the legal entity or person which exists by force of law can have no existence beyond the State or sovereignty which brings it into life and endues it with its faculties and powers. (Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company vs. Wheeler, 1 Black, 297.)

And the same court affirms this doctrine in a recent case, and adjudges that such legislation by separate States has simply the effect of creating two separate corporations "acting in each State according to the powers locally bestowed, as distinctly as though they had nothing in common either as to name, capital, or membership." (Clark vs. Barnard, 108 United States, 452.)

If, then, the intent of this act is, as the act clearly expresses it to be, to confer an additional franchise upon a New Jersey corporation to be exercised both in New Jersey and New York, and an additional franchise upon a New York corporation to be exercised both in New York and New Jersey, such intent is clearly beyond the powers of Congress to accomplish. Admitting, for the present, that the Federal Government has power to construct bridges within the territory of New Jersey, it is clear that it can exercise its power only by its own agents, natural or artificial; and if it wills to construct the proposed bridge over Staten Island Sound by a corporate agent it must create a corporation for that purpose.

Thus when the Federal Government determined to exercise its powers in respect to the Federal currency, &c., through corporate agents it necessarily created the national banks for that purpose; for it is surely clear that it could not have conferred upon State banks, having only the franchise of receiving and investing deposits, the additional franchises of discount and issue. And if the Federal Government had availed itself of State banks already holding the franchises of discount and issue, it is clear that it would have been because in that case the Federal Government would have availed itself of the exercise by the State banks, in the execution of the Federal agency, of franchises already conferred upon them by the State.

The bill No. 121 is not apt to create a bridge corporation, and if Congress asserts the power to construct this bridge and to create a corporation as its agent for that purpose, it should not resort to indirection to accomplish its ends. The dignity of Congress requires that its grants should be clear and explicit, and not be couched in terms which upon their face import the conferring of additional franchises upon the creatures of the States. If Congress can confer, it must be because it has legislative dominion over the corporation, and if it has such dominion it can also take away; the result would be that Congress has unlimited power to amend the charters of State corporations.

But it may be said that Congress merely intends to give the Federal assent to such interruption of the navigation of the Staten Island Sound as will be occasioned by a bridge already authorized by State law. The terms of this act are peculiarly inapt for such purpose. They purport to give original authority to construct the bridge, and not merely to permit the partial invasion of the navigation right; and the report of the Senate committee avows that to be the intent of the act.

It is necessary therefore to consider the power of the Federal Government to construct a bridge within the territory of New Jersey and upon and over the lands of the State without its consent. This power is boldly claimed in the report of the Senate committee as a necessary incident to the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce in general and the commerce between the States.

It is obvious that the power to construct a bridge is limited to its construction for the public use, and includes the power of taking by the "eminent domain" such land as may be necessary for the construction thereon of the "towers" of a suspension bridge, or the abutments and piers, or piles, supporting such a structure as is described in Senate bill No. 121, and of crossing over the land underneath the structure by a permanent occupation of such crossings.

That the land intended to be appropriated and occupied under the authority of this act, from ordinary high-water mark to the middle thread of Staten Island Sound is the sole property of the State of New Jersey has been abundantly settled by the Federal Supreme Court.

It is not necessary to state particularly the charters and grants under which they (plaintiffs) claim. They are all set out in the special verdict in the case of Martin vs. Waddell, reported in 16 Peters, 367. The title claimed by the proprietors in that case was the same with the title upon which the plaintiff now relies. And upon very full argument and consideration in the case referred to, the court were of opinion that the soil under the public navigable waters of East New Jersey belonged to the State, and not to the proprietors, and the decision in that case must govern this. (Den vs. Jersey Company, 15 How., 432.)

And the same court in another case adjudged as follows:

This supposed compact (between the United States and the State of Alabama) is nothing more than a regulation of commerce, to that extent, among the several States, and can have no controlling influence in the decision of the case before us. This right of eminent domain over the shores and soils under the navigable waters, for all municipal purposes, belongs exclusively to the States within their respective territorial jurisdictions, and they, and they only, have the constitutional power to exercise it. To give to the United States the right to transfer to a citizen the title to the shores and soils under navigable waters would be placing in their hands a weapon which might be wielded greatly to the injury of State sovereignty and deprive the States of the power to exercise a numerous and important class of police powers. (Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, 3 How., 230.)

And one of the conclusions at which the court finally arrived is stated on the same page as follows:

First. The shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively.

And the same court has with equal distinctness affirmed the ruling in 3 Howard above cited by its judgment in the following cases: Goodtitle vs. Kibbe, 9 How., 471; Doe vs. Beebe, 13 How., 25. If the State of New Jersey then has title in fee to the shores and soils under the navigable waters of Staten Island Sound, it also has the incidents of such title and is the owner thereof ab imo usque ad cœlum; nor can the United States or any person or corporation by its authority construct an abutment on the shore or erect piers or piles upon the soil under the water of Staten Island Sound, nor stretch a bridge or viaduct through the air above such soil, except by the consent of the State. Nor has the Federal Government ever pretended to exercise such power; nor has the Federal court ever adjudged the existence of such power. The Senate committee have avowed that the power exists and has been repeatedly exercised, but an examination of the cases will show that in all of them the States owning the shores and soil under the navigable waters permitted by Congress to be crossed by a bridge had previously authorized the construction of such bridge, or was acquiescing therein.

Such was the fact in Pennsylvania vs. Wheeling, &c., Bridge Company (13 How., 518); Pennsylvania vs. Wheeling, &c., Bridge Company (18 How., 421); Wilson vs. Blackbird, &c., Company (2 Pet., 250); Gilman vs. Philadelphia (3 Wall., 713); Mississippi, &c., Company vs. Ward (2 Black., 485); The Clinton Bridge (10 Wall., 454); Bridge Company vs. United States (105 U. S., 470); Miller vs. Mayor of New York (109 U. S., 385). In none of these cases is there an intimation from either bar or court that Congress had power to construct or empower another to construct a bridge across a navigable stream within the limits of a State. On the contrary, in every case the reasoning and the judgment of the Supreme Federal Court are accordant with the authoritative enunciations of that court in Gilman vs. Philadelphia (3 Wallace, 713, &c.). On page 724 the court say as follows:

Commerce implies navigation. The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control, for that purpose and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a State other than those in which they lie. For this purpose they are the public property of the nation, and subject to all the requisite legislation by Congress. This necessarily includes the power to keep them open and free from any obstruction to their navigation, interposed by the States or otherwise, to remove such obstructions when they exist, and to provide by such sanctions as they may deem proper against the occurrence of the evil and for the punishment of offenders. For these purposes Congress possesses all the powers which existed in the States before the adoption of the national Constitution, and which have always existed in the Parliament in England.

And on page 725 of the same case the court further speaks as follows:

We will now turn our attention to the rights and powers of the States which are to be considered.

The National Government possesses no powers but such as have been delegated to it. The States have all but such as they have surrendered. The power to authorize the building of bridges is not to be found in the Federal Constitution. It has not been taken from the States. It must reside somewhere. They had it before the Constitution was adopted, and they have it still.

This authoritative and specific definition and limitation of the Federal power over navigable waters within the territories of the States, and co-ordinate determination that the exclusive power of constructing bridges over such waters is and always has been vested in the States, effectually disposes of the report of the Senate committee and conclusively demonstrates this bill to be unconstitutional and void.

Its object is by Federal authority to violate a State statute which prohibits the construction of any bridge across the Staten Island Sound (Pamphlet Laws of New Jersey 1878, page 343), to seize upon the lands of the State of New Jersey and donate them to the perpetual use of a corporation created by itself and a corporation created by the State of New York, and, as openly avowed by the Senate committee, this spoliation is to be committed for the use of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Maryland, and this is to be accomplished in despite of the protest of the State of New Jersey twice repeated, through joint resolutions adopted by its Legislature, and presented by its Senators and Representatives to both Houses of Congress.

Mr. President, there is no doubt about the feasibility of a tunnel at the point named. The channel itself being only about 600 feet wide, all the surrounding circumstances are such as are favorable to the construction and maintenance and repair of a tunnel; but failing in the eunnel, while the State of New Jersey objects very strongly to anything that looks like a bridge that would obstruct navigation across what is to it and to its citizens this most important channel, I would not have any hesitation in being favorable myself to a reasonably fair bridge. And if the Senate do not think the proposition of my colleague for a tunnel is a proper one, there is in the immediate vicinity of this proposed crossing a point where the channel widens out to a thousand feet and where there is an island in the exact center of it where the construction of a bridge 70 feet high would relieve four-fifths of the commerce of the sound, as it would enable the railroad company to give a span about four or five hundred feet wide leaving on the other side a small draw which would reduce the expense in that particular. I should think this 700-foot bridge with its approaches could very readily be constructed at an additional cost of $500,000.

I have shown conclusively to my own satisfaction, and I think to that of any fair gentleman who will look into it, that the absolute increased cost in the handling of the different products through this bridge in its present condition would amount to more than this $500,000 per year.

There is no reason in the world why people like these, engaged all their lives in this particular branch of business, having all their capital invested in it, should be absolutely destroyed as you propose to do here for anything that will reduce the usefulness or add to the cost of transportation of a ton of coal. There is no reason why it should be done in the interest of a corporation if there is a corporation that is to build this bridge. If there is a great powerful company that will build a bridge across this kill, and if the interests of interstate commerce require it, there is no reason why a bridge should bear hardly on the commerce of the stream, there is no reason why they should not add $500,000 or a million dollars to the expense if that will give them all they require, and if it will save harmless the people who have enjoyed their nautical rights so long and who have their capital invested in their water craft.

If the amendment of my colleague for the construction of a tunnel shall not meet with the approbation of the Senate, I will offer some amendments which will increase the height of the proposed bridge and locate it at the point I have indicated about half a mile off.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to consume more than a few minutes of the time of the Senate to meet one or two points presented by the Senators from New Jersey in opposition to the construction of this bridge.

Both the Senators from New Jersey dwelt at considerable length and with emphasis upon the fact that this bridge is mainly intended to accommodate the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The Baltimore and Ohio company, as is known to everybody, is a corporation of the State of Maryland, and, therefore, I took no part in the Committee on Commerce in the determination of this question. The Pennsylvania Railroad also passes through the State of Maryland, and I am correct in saying that it has more miles of track within the State of Maryland than has the Baltimore and Ohio company.
